EFFICIENCY | K-State studying ways to become more energy-efficient

that allows students a chance to become Leadership in Energy Environmental Design certified to design "green" buildings and rate the structures according to their energy efficiency.

Yunk said that K-State considered building the Jardine apartments according to LEED's standards, but decided against it. However, the Alumni Foundation is constructing a building that will incorporate green building, he said.

LEED-certified buildings have more efficient systems, use daylight effectively by designing more windows, and use less chemicals in adhesives and finishings, he said.

"Older buildings can be improved through heating, cooling and lighting - which are the utilities campuses around the nation are improving in order to become more economical," he said.

"You need to identify energy use, quantify that, and set goals to reduce that use," he added.

Boggs said students could help energy efficiency on campus by turning off lights, closing windows and shutting down their computers overnight.

The Association for the Advancement of Sustainability in Higher Education is launching a pilot rating system similar to LEED called STARS (Sustainability Tracking, Assessment, and Rating System), according to a press release from PR.com. This system differs from LEED in that it rates the sustainability of "an entire campus rather than a single building or set of buildings and evaluates social responsibility as well as environmental stewardship," according to the press release.

More than 90 colleges and universities across the nation will test this self-assessment tool this year. There is currently no existing system that translates sustainability factors into one single metric, according to the press release. This system is designed to make comparison across campuses easy and to enable institutional benchmarking, according to the article.

He said while K-State is pursuing ways to conserve energy and save money, the focus remains on the students and faculty using the buildings.

"The important thing to keep in mind is that people's children are here," Boggs said. "We're trying to keep people comfortable; that's a task sometimes."

added level of significance following the death of Vanessa Stewart, the mother of K-State men's basketball senior guard Clent Stewart, who died Tuesday after a long battle with bone cancer.

"That just goes to show how cancer touches everyone's lives, and here at K-State with Clent losing his mom to a battle with cancer just epitomizes the reality of this disease, so for all of us it hit home," Patterson said. "It's as important of a game we will play all season long because the issue transcends a ball and a rim."

Senior guard Kimberly Dietz said the game means a lot because both teams will be showing their support for the cause and it will mean even more considering the game involves women.

"We are women and it's a more common cancer in women, so it's something we just have to be aware of and hopefully find a cure for someday," Dietz said.

icance of the game following the loss of a member of the K-State family.

"Obviously, it is something special, I think even more so after Clent's mom passed away," she said. "I think it's something bigger than basketball and I think it's an awesome thing for us to have support for that."

K-State (15-6, 7-1 Big 12) will get its first opportunity to recover from a 63-49 loss to Baylor Feb. 2. KU (13-8, 2-6 Big 12) is coming off its own week-long break following a 53-50 win over Iowa State.

PROJECT | Student aims to reduce carbon emissions in atmosphere

"Go Green" program, which provides a list of 24 ways to be more environmentally conscious. She said each greek chapter picks 16 items from the list to focus on.

Hamm said she is working with other groups on campus to make a larger effect.

"I'm not trying to keep this campaign in just the greek community, either," Hamm said. "I've been meeting with different groups on campus to create essential movements with environmental issues."

Hamm's strategic efforts and passion toward her project have impressed some members of the greek community.

Macy Wendler, senior in apparel and textiles and president of the Panhellenic Council, which sponsors the "Greeks Go Green" campaign, said she appreciates Hamm's dedication.

"I think her campaign is a great way to show everyone what a big difference small changes can make and that the greek community is making a difference in that," Wendler said.

Some administrators in the Office of Greek Affairs said the issues Hamm is focusing on with her project affect K-State as a whole.

"The conversations about shrinking carbon footprints, lessening polluting emissions, recycling, reducing and reusing are not just conversations happening in K-State classrooms," said Shawn Eagleburger, assistant director of Greek Affairs. "These conversations are happening within the walls of our fraternity and sorority homes, and as an adviser, I could not be more proud."

RECYCLE | Community has several places to recycle various items

the bathroom - two of mixed office paper, two of newspaper, two of plastic bottles and one of aluminum cans - were just one week's worth of trash, she said.

"It's a convenience thing for people," Newton said. "Students just don't think ahead. They finish off their drink and they put it down, or they finish their Sudoku and they put the paper down, and they forget about it. So at the end of the day when custodians come through, there's so much trash that we don't have time to sort through everything."

Lack of recycling is not a laziness issue, Newton said, but an educational issue. She said students might not even know the building they're in has recycling bins, or if they do, they just don't think about it.

Part of the issue might be the fact that not every building on campus offers easily accessible recycling. John Woods, director of custodial facilities, said he is working to change that.

Most campus buildings have at least one recycling bin on their lowest level, but Woods said he is trying what he calls a "desk-side recycling program." Each building's offices will receive a three-sectioned recycling container - one section for newspaper, one for magazines and one for mixed paper. At the end of the day, custodians will collect the papers and take them to the lower section of the building where recycling trucks will properly dispose of them.

Woods said Dykstra, Ackert, Durland and Seaton halls are the only buildings with the desk-side program. However, he said as soon as the department receives larger recycling containers, he plans to make the program campuswide.

"Recycling is important to reduce the amount of material that goes into a landfill," he said. "It also reduces the amount of trees and various other products that have to be used to make the paper or plastic or aluminum cans. So the more you recycle, the less natural resources have to be used to make the products."

The campus recycling program is run by the custodial department, and there is no city wide residential recycling pick-up. However, students can still help out with the environmental effort from their own homes.

Howard Wilson, co-owner of Howie's, said students should collect recyclable items - plastics, papers, cardboard and aluminum products - and drop them off at Howie's. If the load is at least five pounds, he said recyclers can even receive cash back.

Prices are constantly fluctuating and vary from item to item, but to get an idea of the payback, Wilson said aluminum cans are currently worth 40 cents a piece if they are part of a load between 5 and 100 pounds.

Howie's also provides Manhattan residents with an opportunity to help local and national charities by recycling.

When dropping recyclable items in a designated bin, Howie's will donate the item's worth to the bin's respective organization. The three main organizations are Habitat for Humanity, the Manhattan Humane Society and the Aquatics Center. Wilson also said anyone can set up an account with Howie's to have a donation box for individual organizations like churches.

Newton said she and her husband always take their household recycling to Howie's and want students to know recycling is "not the pain in the butt" some people make it out to be.

"Not to be preachy," she said, "but I would love students to think about - instead of just dumping paper off onto a chair and leaving it somewhere - to take that two seconds between waiting for class or entering class or leaving class, to go and toss it in a recycling bin. Just don't throw it away."

Love go away

Perpetually distracting actions unnecessary, should be diminished

Illustration by Nate Schmidt | COLLEGIAN

When another February crept into our lives, I couldn't help but think, "Fantastic, another Valentine's Day is coming up."

Love is a pretty funny thing when we really think about it. Some people can't live with it, while others can't live without it. The Beatles once said, "All you need is love," and almost every country song is about love, so it seems as long as there has been music there have been songs about love.

No offense to the Beatles, but I think we need other emotions as well as love, and we can go for quite a while without showing we are affectionate toward someone, specifically on campus.

I know I'm not the only single person in the world because, according to the latest census results from 2001, there are 85 million single people in the United States. I can only speculate that most of those single people feel the same way about the overly commercialized holiday we all so lovingly call Valentine's Day.

To most single people, Valentine's Day is just another day of the year, so why should there be increased Public Displays of Affection on Feb. 14? I believe some public displays of affection are alright, but not full-on make-out sessions, so I've taken it upon myself to make a list of great places that should remain PDA-free this Valentine's Day.

Though the list is long, walking through campus was the first place that came to mind - I can't even begin to count the number of times I've been trapped behind an extremely touchy-feely couple when I'm trying to get to class or work while walking on campus. Even if you're in a committed relationship, it's still unpleasant to get stuck behind one of those couples when you have places to be.

The only thing worse than being stuck behind a PDA-loving pedestrian couple is being stuck behind PDA-loving drivers. The streets on campus are narrow, so there's no need to hold up traffic when you're dropping off or picking up a significant other on campus. You'll only be away from them for 50 minutes generally,

When people go to the library, it's usually to study. I'm in my last year at K-State, and when I go to the library, it's when I really need to hit the books hard. The task of studying is made that much harder when I have to drown out the couple at the next table who are all over each other.

Most students go to the K-State Student Union to pass some extra time between classes or to grab lunch, so please don't be that couple who makes other students lose their appetite or the meal they've already eaten. I've also had to use a different ATM in the Union because couples who just can't seem to get enough of each other block the line. All I wanted to do was get some cash.

There's no place more frustrating to be stuck behind

PDA's than at a sporting event. I'll admit I have some friends who are in relationships who seem to be more touch-oriented than most, and they hang on each other at games, but I always try to say something to them. After all, you did pay to watch the game and hopefully not for your significant other.

At any rate, Valentine's Day isn't different from any other day of the year, so maybe we should work as a student body to reduce the amount of PDA we showcase on a year-round basis. Everyone knows you should like the person you're dating, but instead of smothering each other in public why not try other alternatives?

Wives find ways to send their love to husbands overseas

It's hard enough trying to plan the perfect Valentine's Day for your significant other, but trying to do it when they're fighting a war overseas makes it more difficult. Deployments are becoming more common these days, but that doesn't change the fact that it's hard for couples to be apart on those special holidays.

As an army spouse, I can say from personal experience, those long months apart are hell. It's not just the day-to-day hassles that make it almost unbearable; it's also the anniversaries, the holidays and especially Valentine's Day.

While other couples are having romantic candlelit dinners and celebrating their love for one another, military spouses are either trying to pretend it's any other day or are out binge drinking in Aggieville along with the lonely singles of Manhattan. There are a few things, though, that we can do for our brave soldiers to let them know they are appreciated and extremely loved, especially on Valentine's Day.

Lisa Portz, an Army National Guard wife for more than 12 years, tried to help her husband feel special on All Saint's Day while he was deployed to Kosovo. She sent a romantic card and candy for all of the soldiers in his unit.

"It was important to celebrate the day because regardless of what holiday it is, it's hard on them, whether or not they want to come out and admit it," Portz said.

Her husband, Sgt. 1st Class Kit Portz was deployed for nearly 18 months to Camp Bondsteel. This was the couple's first deployment and first time in 10 years they were not together for Valentine's Day.

"It sucked. Every year he would send me flowers and take me out to a nice restaurant. But he made up for not being there by sending me a card with a drawing of a bouquet," Portz said.

Sending care packages and letters are great ways to show soldiers how much they are missed back home. Cheryl Smith, manager of the West-loop UPS store, recommends sending your packages a few weeks in advance.

"Priority mail takes one to three weeks and Parcel Post can take six weeks to arrive at an APO in Iraq or Afghanistan," Smith said.

While UPS offers excellent service, a great cost-cutting tip would be to send your gifts in a flat-rate box provided at any U.S. post office. You will be limited by the size of the boxes but as long as the box can close on itself, it will only cost $8.95 to ship anywhere in the United States and to any military post office.

Having sent quite a few care packages myself, I know it can get to be pretty expensive pretty fast. I also recommend using several flat rate boxes if you have many to send because it ends up being cheaper than just putting everything all in one big box.

No matter how you ship it, your loved one will appreciate getting something reminding them of home.

For Kristen Tebow, sophomore in criminology, and her boyfriend PFC Tyler Low, this Valentine's Day will be especially hard apart because it's also their first-year anniversary. Low left for Iraq in September 2007 and is due to come back home next December. This is the first deployment for both of them.

To commemorate Valentine's Day and their anniversary, Tebow plans on sending a homemade blanket, cookies, a case of Red Bull and a DVD with pictures of the couple throughout the year.

When asked what her plans were for Valentine's Day, Tebow said, "I'll probably get together with my friends who also have boyfriends that are gone. We'll probably end up watching movies and trying not to think about it."

Though every day is hard when your military spouse is deployed, it's holidays like Valentine's Day that you want to make sure they know they are deeply loved and truly missed. Even though they will be opening their gifts in less than perfect conditions, getting a card or a box brightens their day just knowing someone, somewhere cares for them.

This Valentines Day, don't end up buying a gift your guy won't like.

"To tell you the truth," said DeMarkus Coleman, Footlocker sales associate and sophomore in business. "The stuff the ladies come in and buy, a couple days later it's being returned or exchanged because the men don't particularly care for what their ladies chose for them. Like earlier today a man returned two pairs of shoes that his girlfriend bought him as a gift. Women have good taste in certain things, but when it comes to sneakers, I don't know."

One of the most popular gifts is cologne. Coleman said he recommended the scents of Usher and unforgivable by Sean John.

However, Matt Shull, Zales store manager, said watches are a popular gift item.

"I would say one of the most popular gift ideas for men from women for Valentine's Day is a watch," he said. "Watches most often for a holiday like this, the gift will be designed for formal or evening wear. It hints to the gentleman that they should go out to dinner more."

Shull, K-State alumnus, said he doesn't recommend cologne because he considers it the ultimate fall back gift. A nice evening with a homemade cooked meal is something practical. He said boxers are a great gift that he has received many times. But, he said don't buy any with hearts or such, just get solid colors that way they are more usable.

One of the most useful and can't go wrong presents are gift cards.

Kelly Kohout, Game Stop sales associate and junior in English, said, gift cards actually convey a message of I don't know what to get you because I don't know you that well. However, a gift card allows the guy to get what they want.

Popular items at Game Stop are 360 games like Call of Duty 4 and Assassin's Creed, Guitar Hero 3, and occasionally accessories and computer games Kohout said. Tools are another gift idea for any man. Adam Mahlstedt, hard line supervisor at Sears, said, "Sears carries in depth laser levels and laser tools. We're also the only ones who carry laser engraved mechanics' tools and we also have portable stuff that can be laser engraved with their initials."

He said you can spend anywhere from $20 to $200 and even reach into the $1,000 for mechanics' tool sets and toolboxes. Sears also sells electronics that go over well Mahlstedt said. Sears is selling at a lot of small items this year, such as digital cameras.

Shull's favorite holiday is Valentine's Day and he said, "Don't get something cliché. I think you should buy anything, but roses for Valentine's Day. Get something different. Stand out."

Since Valentine's Day is on a Thursday this year make it an extended holiday and take a vacation with your special someone, Paulownia Clark, Dillard's top men's sale associate and senior in biology, said.

"I think it is the most romantic time to take a couples trip on Valentine's Day," she said. I think this time it is on Thursday, so if you left on Thursday and went for the whole weekend I think that would be great. Everybody can use a vacation so why not make it your lover's holiday to do so."

Flowers are popular V-Day gift for women

By Nicole Johnston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flowers are a popular gift for anyone on Valentine's Day. That's why the local florists spend a month of chaos in preparation for the big day.

"Valentine's Day at Acme is crazy, exhausting and fun all at the same time," said Diane Meredith, co-owner of Acme Gifts in Aggieville. "We are really excited about Valentine's Day this year."

Flower shops around town are already getting in large shipments of flowers and preparing for the holiday.

"We always have a theme song, so when it's 1 a.m. and we are feeling tired we can all get up and feel energized," Meredith said.

Preparation for Valentine's Day starts earlier than one would imagine. Meredith said after the rush of Valentine's Day, they immediately sit down and talk and take notes about how everything went and what to do differently next year.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral, said she has received orders this year as early as January.

"Some guys were tired of waiting in line last year, so they made their orders in January," Medlin said. "We've already started preparing. We get flowers in everyday, and we have to follow procedures to make them last long."

Both florists agreed the chaos changes from year to year, but one aspect that is the same every year is the long day of deliveries. Medlin said their shop delivers until the flowers are gone, which can lead to late hours.

Acme Gift delivery drivers are sent out with special packs to help them get through the day. The packs include candy, granola bars, maps and other essentials.

"I try to talk people into sending their flowers the day before Valentine's Day but it's hard because everyone wants their flowers delivered on the day," Medlin said.

Shaun Kirmer, K-State alumnus, said he is thinking about having his flowers delivered the day before to avoid the hassle and busyness. His wife's favorite flower is a lily, and she's not the only who enjoys those flowers. Lilies are popular every year at both Westloop and Acme. But their best sellers are very different.

"Hands-down our most popular flower year round is the daisy," Meredith said. "Roses are low on our list because people come here for a different selection."

Roses are on the top of the list for Westloop Floral shoppers.

"We sell hundreds of dozens of roses for Valentine's Day," Medlin said. "All together we sell several thousand roses. Our best seller each year is the dozen-rose arrangement."

While each shop has different customers, the flowers at each are premium flowers with creative designs.

Medlin said they do several special designs with trendy containers and other design aspects. She said the designs in the past years have become more compact, many of same flowers in a vase and no greenery.

"Something people need to be aware of is when they order online with an order gatherer, the purchase will cost them more," Medlin said. "They retain a portion of the money, where as if going to the shop, you'll save money. There are no additional fees, just flowers plus delivery. Also, in the shop you see what the selection is, when online they might not be the nicest or freshest."

For those who are looking to please their significant other and are short on cash, Meredith said an orchid is a good choice.

"Orchids are pretty hardy and not very expensive," she said. "A few dollars a stem and we can add tropical leaves and make anyone think they are on spring break."

While men and women of all ages buy flowers, Medlin says this is the one time when men really turn out in numbers.

"People love to get flowers, everyone is excited and happy when they get them," she said. "It makes anyone feel really special."

Throwing a Valentine's party offers fun, simple alternative for singles

By Elise Nimitz
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Couples aren't the only people who can celebrate Valentine's Day. Remember in elementary school when everyone looked forward to Feb. 14, because it meant eating sweets and was an excuse to party? Why not do the same kind of celebrating if you're single and in college? Gather up plenty of friends to have a bash so exciting that guests will want to break their Valentine's Day dates with significant others and hang out at your place instead.

Send out invites online so everyone knows the details about the party. Use the Facebook.com events application to determine, which people will show up and to make any changes to the plans.

Decorating for a Valentine's Day party should be cheap and easy. You don't need to impress anybody, but it's an occasion different from any random, Thursday night house party.

Walt Pesaresi, owner of Mr. P's Party Outlet on Poyntz Avenue, said his store has a variety of decorations including banners, centerpieces, red party beads and balloons.

"Balloons are a very inexpensive and simple way to decorate," Pesaresi said. "We rent helium tanks and do balloon deliveries, and we have a large selection of latex and mylar balloons."

Pesaresi said at 70 cents a balloon, a person could make a statement by building a balloon wall using multiple strings attached to weights, each with five balloons on a string. He also said a centerpiece that uses only three balloons saves money and wouldn't block the whole table. Pesaresi said the store will open two hours early on Valentine's Day to accommodate customers.

Buy drinks earlier in the week and make food beforehand so you won't have to rush around the day of the party or risk a store being out of what you need.

If you want to have party favors for guests, take advantage of seasonal-product sales at superstores.

This time of year, Target sells small Valentine's Day merchandise for approximately $1 a piece. Since it is almost guaranteed there will be a chocolate fiend at the party, stock up on Valentine's Day candy. Most stores offer specials this week on a variety of candy and gift packages.

Make your guests feel cared for; that is one Valentine's Day tradition that should be followed.

Enjoy yourself on the 14th, and there is no reason for this year not to be the most memorable Valentine's Day.

Stir it up

Cooking at home offers alternative to eating out on Valentine's Day

Let's face it, waiting for a table at a restaurant is not uncommon in this town — especially on holidays and Valentine's Day. Every year, couples go to restaurants to enjoy a special dinner and spend a large amount of time just waiting to get a seat in the process.

This Valentine's Day, try staying home and bringing out the apron. This could be the holiday you cook a special dinner together, and you might end up stirring up something else as well.

According to a survey CorningWare gave, there are a number of benefits to cooking together like talking more, laughing more, working better as a team and being more relaxed. The survey also showed couples who cook together are more likely to be very satisfied with their relationships.

The entire process from start to finish is the perfect opportunity for couples to have fun and spend time together. Choosing the meal might be the most difficult thing, with so many options to choose from, where will you start?

Here are several ideas including entrée and dessert. Pick one of each or use resources like foodnetwork.com, recipelink.com or allrecipes.com.

Now, enjoy the experience of grocery shopping together. No matter how long you've been together, this could be time taken advantage of. Not every grocery shopping experience needs to be made into one of substance but for Valentine's Day it can be. Selecting all the ingredients and deciding together is a great way to work as a team and learn more about each other.

Cooking should be fun, so enjoy it. Turn on some music, and get started. Each person having a hand in helping will really get things going. From cooking to clean-up, you will enjoy an evening focused on your relationship, something you can't get at a restaurant.

Valentine's Day isn't just about giving and receiving gifts, it's about showing your love and appreciation for others of significance in your life. Cooking on Valentine's Day is obviously not just limited to couples. It is also a great opportunity for friends to get together and share the responsibilities of putting together a great tasting meal.

The costs of cooking a meal for two can be much cheaper than eating at a restaurant as well. Whether it's a couple or friends, everyone can split the costs of groceries, making this affectionate activity affordable for all.

1 cup sliced carrots
1 cup sliced mushrooms

2 cooked chicken breast halves, diced (about 2 cups)
1 cup diced roasted red peppers
1 (14-ounce) can diced tomatoes
1 cup reduced-sodium chicken broth
1/2 cup frozen green peas, thawed
Salt and freshly ground black pepper
1/3 cup grated Parmesan
1/4 cup freshly chopped basil leaves

S'MORES BROWNIES

Crust:
6 tablespoons unsalted butter, melted
1 1/2 cups crushed graham cracker crumbs
2 tablespoons sugar
Pinch fine salt

Topping:
4 cups large marshmallows

Position a rack in the lower third of the oven and heat oven to 325 degrees fahrenheit. Line an 8 by 8-inch square baking pan with foil so it hangs over the edges by about 1 inch.

For the crust: Lightly butter the foil with some of the melted butter. Stir the rest of the butter together with the crumbs, sugar, and salt in a medium bowl. Press the crumb mixture evenly over the bottom of the pan. Bake until golden brown, or about 20 minutes.

Meanwhile, make the brownie. Put the butter and chocolate in a medium microwave safe bowl. Melt in the microwave on 75 percent power for 2 minutes. Stir, and microwave again until completely melted, about 2 minutes more. Stir the light brown and

Brownie:
One big bowl of Oranges
8 tablespoons (1 stick) unsalted butter
4 ounces unsweetened chocolate, chopped
1 cup packed light brown sugar
3/4 cup white sugar
1 1/2 teaspoons pure vanilla extract
1/2 teaspoon fine salt
4 large cold eggs
1 cup all-purpose flour

white sugars, vanilla and salt into the melted chocolate. Add the eggs and beat vigorously to make a thick and glossy batter. Add the flour and stir until just incorporated. Pour batter into the prepared pan. Bake until the top is crispy and a toothpick inserted into the middle comes out mostly clean, with a few crumbs, about 40 to 45 minutes. Remove from the oven and carefully position a rack about 6 inches from the broiler and preheat on low. Layer marshmallows across the top and toast under the broiler until golden, (keep an eye on it, it can go quick), about 2 minutes. Cool on a rack, gently removing the brownies from the pan using the aluminum flaps. Carefully separate any marshmallow from the foil and fold away. Cut into 12 (2-inch) squares.

CANDY BAR COOKIES

1 1/2 sticks (12 tablespoons) butter, melted, plus a little more for greasing the pan
1 1/2 cups sugar
2 large eggs
2 tablespoons water
1/2 teaspoon vanilla extract
1/2 teaspoon salt

1/2 teaspoon baking powder
3/4 cups unsweetened cocoa powder
1/2 cup all-purpose flour
10 mini chocolate-peanut candy bars, crumbled (about 1 1/2 cups), refrigerator cold (recommended: Snickers "fun size") Preheat oven to 350 degrees F.

Grease a 9 by 13-inch cake pan (aluminum is fine) with butter. Beat the 1 1/2 sticks butter and the sugar together in a large bowl until blended. Beat in the eggs 1 at a time, then stir in water and vanilla. Sprinkle the salt and baking powder over the mixture, then mix in. Do the same with the cocoa. Finally, stir in the flour until just blended. Put the candy bars in a food processor or blender and pulse on low speed until all the bars have been reduced to a coarse crumble. Fold the crumble into the batter thoroughly. Scrape the batter into the prepared pan. Bake for about 30 minutes, until the center is set, the edges look a bit crusty, and the top of the brownies start to crack a little. Cool completely before cutting into squares.

Presidential candidate Mike Huckabee swept Riley County and Kansas votes alike Saturday in the first Kansas Republican caucus in 20 years.

Riley County had 439 participants Saturday morning at Pottroff Hall in Cico Park. Huckabee received 204 votes while McCain captured second with 137 votes. Overall, Huckabee received the state's entire 36 delegates.

McCain still leads in total delegates as of Sunday afternoon with 714 pledged delegates next to Huckabee's 217 pledged delegates, according to www.CNN.com. Holly Friesen, Riley County Republican Women secretary and Huckabee spokeswoman, said Huckabee still can win the Republican presidential nomination.

Friesen spoke her limit of 10 minutes about Huckabee's governorship and platform issues with several interruptions of audience applause.

"Huckabee understands that leadership is serving people," Friesen said. "He promises to do what he did in Arkansas and put a framed picture up in the White House. That's not a picture of him but a picture of a regular citizen so that he never forgets 'I work for them; they don't work for me.'"

The Kansas Republican Party had its caucus Saturday instead of on Super Tuesday because its members thought a mid-week caucus would discourage participation, said Tim Bagby, Riley County Republican Party chairman. The

Christian rapper uses radio, lyrics to share faith with campus

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At age 20, Clifford Watkins has already experienced what some might define as a miracle. During his senior year of high school, Watkins encountered a life-altering moment that few others will ever experience.

While working at St. Luke's hospital in his hometown of Kansas City, Mo., Watkins, sophomore in pre-journalism mass communications, said he was approached by a man who turned his life around. He steered Watkins off the "normal" path of high school students and gave him a 360-degree turn toward the Lord, Watkins said.

The man asked Watkins if he knew Jesus. Though Watkins answered yes, the man proceeded with his questioning, asking if Watkins truly knew him.

"It opened my eyes," Watkins said. "I was supposed to do more than go to church, I was supposed to move and follow him."

When meeting Watkins, he appears to be any other college student but once he begins to speak, it is obvious that he is different. Passion and confidence fall freely from his lips with dramatic flavor. His personality is a culmination of faith, diligence and trust that is rarely found.

Making a change to follow the Lord left Watkins fighting several internal battles. Growing up, he was forced to attend Sunday services, which hindered, rather than helped his faith. Watkins said his family attempted to "provide as much support in this sudden transformation as possible."

"My parents support me but they don't know exactly where I'm coming from," he said. "They're not as strong as I am."

As an initial transition into his new life, Watkins removed many of the adverse substances in his life.

"One of the first things I did was get rid of all my CDs — my cussing, rap CDs. Another change that I made was not having relations with my girlfriend and stuff like that," Watkins said. "I was really serious about changing my life."

Watkins said the change was extremely difficult. Not only was his family struggling to grasp his newfound conviction, but his friends also strived to understand.

"I kind of felt alone," he said. "I started making new friends, but it was really hard for me because my friends in high school didn't really understand. This was my senior year and I wasn't getting along with them like I used to. We ended up going our separate ways."

Though Watkins lost his high-school friends, coming to K-State introduced him to a new set of individuals. He could reach out to these individuals and form a connection driven by faith.

Kristel Williams, sophomore in elementary education, has been friends with Watkins for about two years.

"We're best friends. I think what has made our friendship so strong is Christ," Williams said. "I was seeing another male with a Bible on campus and we started doing Bible study. We've been sharing our past and our testimonies. When he talks, it's really enlightening, the things we talk about. Just knowing that those thoughts can come from somebody so young is pretty amazing."

prior to his conversion, she admits to being astounded by his past.

"All the things he used to do before, I'm just like, there's no way you used to do that kind of stuff, because the change is so drastic," she said.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that took place during this week in history

TODAY 1763: FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR ENDS

The Seven Years' War, a global conflict known in the U.S. as the French and Indian War, ended with the signing of the Treaty of Paris by France, Great Britain and Spain.

The Seven Years' War ended with the signing of the treaties of Hubertusburg and Paris in February 1763. In the Treaty of Paris, France lost all claims to Canada and gave Louisiana to Spain, while Britain received Spanish Florida, upper Canada and various overseas French holdings.

TUESDAY 1990: NELSON MANDELA RELEASED FROM PRISON

Nelson Mandela, leader of the movement to end South African apartheid, was released from prison after 27 years of confinement on Feb. 11, 1990.

In 1961, he was arrested for treason, and although acquitted, he was arrested again in 1962 for illegally leaving the country. Convicted and sentenced to five years at Robben Island Prison, he was put on trial again in 1964 on charges of sabotage and sentenced to life in prison.

WEDNESDAY 1895: FRENCH INVENTORS PATENT MOVIE CAMERA-PROJECTOR

French inventors Louis and August Lumiere patented the Cinematographe, a combination movie camera and projector. Thomas Edison had patented his movie camera, the Kinetograph, and a separate viewing machine, the Kinetoscope, in 1893.

THURSDAY 1929: ST. VALENTINE'S DAY MASSACRE

In Chicago, gunmen suspected of employment by organized-crime boss Al Capone murdered seven members of the George "Bugs" Moran North Siders gang in a garage on North Clark Street. The so-called St. Valentine's Day Massacre stirred a media storm centered on Capone and his illegal Prohibition-era activities and motivated federal authorities to redouble their efforts to find evidence incriminating enough to take him off the streets.

FRIDAY 1950: DISNEY'S 'CINDERELLA' OPENS

Walt Disney's animated feature Cinderella opened on this day in 1950. The ethereal Cinderella, based on a fairy tale by the Brothers Grimm, featured enduring songs like "A Dream is a Wish Your Heart Makes" and became one of Disney's most beloved films.

Walt Disney had been releasing feature-length animated movies since 1937, when Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs became the first animated film to run at feature length.

Vietnamese Student Association celebrates Lunar New Year

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Vietnamese Student Association rang in the Year of the Rat with trivia, music and a traditional dragon dance Saturday night in the K-State Student Union Ballroom as part of the Lunar New Year Celebration.

Various groups displaying Asian culture were present as the VSA teamed up with several community groups to celebrate the Southeast Asian tradition of the Lunar New Year.

Tien Le, senior in civil engineering and president of K-State's Vietnamese Student Association, said the group organized the event with the help of the Asian American Student Union and the Japanese Student Association.

Le said the Lunar New Year is celebrated throughout Southeast Asia, not just in China. Le also said one of the reasons the event was organized was to raise local awareness of issues in Southeast Asia.

"We wanted to bring a lot of global issues to the people in attendance," Le said. "There are a lot of things going on in Southeast Asia that people don't realize, and children trafficking is just one of them."

In addition to the help of the other Asian-American student groups on campus, Le and the event's organizers looked beyond K-State's campus to book performers.

The Junction City Tae Kwon Do and Mui Tai group demonstrated one of the branches of martial arts. Rico Steele, a member of the group, performed in the group's demonstrations.

The demonstrations included traditional and weapon forms to showcase the group's fighting style, Steele said.

Steele said the most interesting part for him was getting to experience cultures he had not before.

"I'm from Tennessee, and there are not a lot of [Asians] there, but I can come out here and check it out for myself," Steele said.

Steele's group was not the only martial arts group that performed at the celebration.

Honorable Tiger Martial Arts, a Kung Fu group through the UFM, also displayed its style of martial arts.

Between performances, a jazz band entertained the crowd.

K-State's award-winning dance group Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club performed two dances for the crowd, who applauded them loudly.

Seiji Ikeda, graduate student in web design and director of Yosakoi, said the group had a deeper reason for its performance.

"Anytime we can celebrate our similarities between all Asian countries is always a good opportunity," Ikeda said.

Chinese ambassador to speak this afternoon in Landon Lecture Series

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Chinese ambassador to the United States will speak at 2:30 p.m. today in McCa- Auditorium as part of the distinguished Landon Lecture Series.

Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong will address issues of trade and diplomacy between the United States and China in front of a crowd of K-State faculty and students, many of whom came from China to study at K-State.

Max Lu, associate professor of geography and faculty adviser of the Chinese Student and Scholar Association, said K-State's Chinese population is excited to have the opportunity to see the Chinese ambassador. Lu said the number of Chinese students coming to K-State has increased dramatically during the past few years.

Lu said K-State brought in about 90 students last school year and is bringing in more this year. He also said K-State set up a recruiting station in China and is actively trying to bring undergraduate and graduate students here.

"I think that's probably one reason why K-State decided to invite the Chinese ambassador to Manhattan for the Landon Lecture," he said.

Charles Reagan, Landon Lecture Series chairman, said China's influence on the U.S., especially with trade, should make the ambassador's message important to the K-State community.

WENZHONG

Reagan and Lu both said China's economy has grown drastically over the past two decades and the country is one of the most important trading partners with the U.S.

"That's obvious; if you go to Wal-Mart and all the stores here, a lot of things say 'Made in China,'" Lu said. "I like to emphasize the point that it's a two-way street. If you go to China you will see a lot of American things too, from the fast food restaurants to American vehicles like Humvees. It's kind of crazy to see."

China has come under fire recently, Lu said, because

HIT OR MISS | The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | WRITER'S STRIKE ENDING

The Writer's Guild and the major media companies have finally started to come to an agreement. This means we are one step closer to seeing new episodes of "The Office."

MISS | OVERCROWDING IN BARS

The extra people in town for the basketball games this weekend definitely made it more difficult to reserve a table or buy a drink. However, we can't complain too much since the extra business helps Manhattan's economy.

HIT | CANDIDATES IN KANSAS

Both Mike Huckabee and John McCain visited Kansas Friday to campaign for the Kansas Republican Caucus. Barack Obama also visited before the Democratic Caucus. It's good to know that politicians haven't forgotten about Kansas.

MISS | COLD WEATHER

The Kansas weather just can't make up its mind. Sunday's cold temperatures caught us completely off guard.

HIT | SUPPORT FOR CLENT STEWART

The K-State basketball players, coaches and fans have shown great support for senior Clent Stewart, whose mother died from cancer last week. The athletic department flew Stewart and his father to Manhattan for Saturday's game.

MISS | FIRST ROUND OF TESTS

It's that time of year again. That time when every one of your professors decides to give a test. Hopefully, everyone can survive and make it to round two.

Empty-handed lesson

Recent tornadoes leave victims with loss

With the start of a new year and the passing of Father Time also comes new unpleasant visits from Mother Nature, including more threats of global warming and more specifically, floods and tornadoes.

BLAKE OSBORN

Tuesday evening, severe weather hit the South as tornadoes rolled across Kentucky, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas and Tennessee. According to an article from CNN, this is one of the deadliest outbreaks of tornadoes in 20 years.

Images on the Internet depict mutilated neighborhoods with cars caving in roofs and houses collapsed into piles of rubble. Union University President David Dockery of Jackson, Tenn., said he was awestruck by the damage.

"It looks like a war zone — cars and trucks thrown from one side of the campus to the other," Dockery said.

In Arkansas, a family discovered a treasured ornament still intact as they sifted through the rubble, according to an article from the New York Times. As one family member picked the ornament up, she accidentally dropped it, watching it smash to bits as it hit the ground.

The irony of the situation made the young woman laugh out loud. In spite of all efforts to create and preserve our world, isn't it funny how it can all come crashing down in a single night?

As Americans, we value what we own, from satellite TV to a four-wheel-drive SUV. We are bombarded by media images that urge us to want more — more clothing, more food and more money. At times, it can be overwhelming.

The U.S. has transformed into an empire of materialism, where consumerism is high and minimalism is lower than ever before. If you do not have the newest Apple product or the latest style of North Face, go get it.

And then disaster strikes. This time it was in the South, taking more than 50 lives, according to an article from CNN. It is experiences like this that puts life in perspective and provides us with a wake-up call.

According to an article from USA Today, Seavia Dixon, an Arkansas resident, had nothing left of her home but a bare, concrete slab.

"You know, it's just material things," Dixon said. "We can replace them. We were just lucky to be alive."

Aside from all the faith we inadvertently put into our homes, apartments and residence-hall rooms, it is humbling to realize they can all collapse any second.

People in the Middle East live in a reality in which suicide bombers are a constant threat. In contrast, U.S. citizens are provided with an uncommonly-safe environment.

Instead of worrying whether we will have enough food to eat every day, we are provided with plenty of choices, from the local grocery store to the nearest diner.

With this wealth, it is easy to forget what it feels like not to have food or a home.

Therefore, to begin your next week, try fasting. Try listening to Thoreau's timely advice: "Simplify! Simplify!" We are so accustomed to instant gratification that when we have to wait for food or to delay a purchase, we become impatient.

I am not placing a religious label on this suggestion. Whatever you believe, it cannot hurt to go without food for one day or your iPod for one week.

Give it a try. See what it feels like to not always get what you want, when you want it.

TV commercials should be found insulting by consumers

Think of the most recent shampoo commercial you saw on TV.

The first couple that come to mind might be Pantene Pro-V or Aussie, and a significant amount of men and women dutifully purchase products from these brands every few months.

Commercials back the shampoos and conditioners we've come to love with straightforward boasts of the true quality of such purchases. Our hair needs to be moisturized and, in the 30-second race to brainwash TV viewers, their selling tactics have proved highly effective.

Cell-phone service providers work the same way. Sure, Verizon might have us overusing the question "Can you hear me now?" and AT&T makes us laugh when an elderly woman uses "IDK, my BFF Rose," but we always know what makes one cell-phone company different and better than another in less than one minute.

Now, think about the last Planter's, Dell or GoDaddy.com commercial you've caught. It's hard, isn't it? They're out there, but U.S. companies have slowly grown out of to-the-point, honest ads that hope to gain customers searching for a product or service they know will be worth their time and money. Now, many advertisements involve some man walking through the street having his bum slapped by a police officer.

I was watching "CSI: Miami" the other night, and found myself wishing I had TiVoed the episode so I could fast forward through the three minutes of mindless images. I was appalled by the caliber of advertisements being presented to me. What happened to the days of demonstrating how that razor will give you the closest shave or the vacuum that will clean-up best?

This is an insult to our intelligence and receptiveness to the qualities that make something great. I understand that marketing is cutting-edge, and the need to hit people with something shocking and attention getting is important, but not while sacrificing the target attitudes and likelihood of more consumers purchasing a product.

In fact, a survey on MediaLiteracy.com reported that 61 percent of consumers said today's marketing is out of control and 54 percent of respondents said they avoid buying products that overwhelm them with advertising and marketing.

When companies learn a man with gigantic thighs will drive consumers to use their goods and services, the quality of those goods and services is going to decrease along with our overall satisfaction with life and material needs. Our economy will suffer when a middle-class family cannot afford a decent pair of tennis shoes because we allowed Nike to slip-up on quality.

It's our turn to tell the companies they can't take advantage of us like that. We need to know that spending $5 on toothpaste will keep us from getting cavities, not that we'll slip into a parallel dimension of the North Pole if we brush with that brand.

If this is how we really feel as a society, then we need to hold businesses more accountable when it comes to representing their product on its own merits without the smoke and mirrors.

THE FOURM

The Campus Fourm is the Collegian's anonymous call-in system. The Fourm is edited to eliminate vulgar, racist, obscene and libelous comments. The comments are not the opinion of the Collegian nor are they endorsed by the editorial staff.

Hey, Farmhouse and Triangle: the girls of Iota Eta Pi are trying to decide which frat is more rockin'. So, bring your A game and a bunny or Batman costume to the Nav's V-Day dance.

I wish I could meet Michael Beasley.

I saw four Kappa Deltas walking on campus today. Don't they need to register that?

Yes, lady: I did just smoke that middle-schooler with a snowball.

To whoever is giving someone up for Lent: Wow, Jesus is going to be so proud of you for not stalking for 40 days. Amen.

To the girl wearing flip-flops outside: I found your future husband. He is wearing shorts and a T-shirt.

Is that a hickey or ringworm on your armpit?

To the girl with the jeans full of holes: I wish I looked that good in something so trashy.

To whoever saw me in my flip-flops: I ain't canin'.

So maybe if I ask my husband for a horse for Valentine's Day, he'll finally get me the puppy I've been wanting.

When I hear Bill O'Reilly speak, I feel like I'm taking stupid pills.

Oh, OK. Vaginal sex is dangerous because sometimes little people come out nine months later.

Lt. Dan: What are you doing to the Fourm, Lt. Dan?

I thought I'd run, so I ran and I ran.

The most beautiful name in the whole wide world. I named my boat Jenny.

Don't taze me, bro.

Anal sex is fun and safe if done right. Same as skydiving, cutting into lines and riding the white pony.

K-State PROUD campaign: Make your daddy proud, son. Proud. Proud. Proud.

To the guy that sat down by me in the Hale Library bathroom and started a conversation with me: I appreciate your camaraderie, but I was doing the crossword, man.

I just got done watching "Family Feud," and the second-highest answer for "What do you look out for when you're driving?" was "drunk drivers." That makes no sense.

I just dug the nastiest crap out of my shower drain. I absolutely love having roommates who don't do anything.

To the guy driving on campus who flipped me off: Are we serious?

I think I'm addicted to the Fourm. It's like crack, only not illegal.

Who wouldn't have known it wasn't a white-trash party?

You know you're going to have a great year when you meet your new roommate and she shows you her crooked crack.

To the pregnant girl in Aggieville: go home.

Hey, Blake Young: I want some Buffalo Wild

Wings.

To the girl in "Hannah Montana": you've got the best of both worlds.

The Fourm. That's what she said.

Hey, Fourm: will you call and remind me of everything I said tonight? Because I'm definitely going to forget.

To the girls in the Ford laundry room: shut up. It's T.A.M.

Let's see how many people this pisses off: go Jayhawks.

The only guys I trust is Jack, Jim and José.

McCain visits Kansas on campaign trail

By Aubree Casper
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WICHITA — Just one day after Republican presidential hopeful and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney suspended his bid the 2008 presidential race, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., brought a new message to Kansans.

McCain, slated as the likely winner of the Republican nomination for president, was in Wichita on Friday afternoon at the Hawker-Beechcraft Service Center in an effort to bring Kansas conservatives the message that he holds a socially and fiscally conservative voting record in Congress.

Former presidential candidate Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., introduced McCain.

McCain

Brownback detailed McCain's time as a prisoner of war and said the U.S. needs a president who has "suffered for our country." He also discussed recent thoughts on McCain's growing liberalism by bringing up his consistent pro-life and pro-Second Amendment stances as a legislator.

After establishing a common ground with the audience by sharing that his hero has been and always will be former Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., McCain first addressed his feelings on Romney's departure from the race. He said together, he and Romney are "committed to uniting the [Republican] Party and winning this election," hinting to the former Massachusetts governor as a possible running mate.

Speaking as a Congressman, McCain said he has "never asked for nor received an earmark for Arizona, and as president will veto any bill that comes across his desk asking for any earmark."

He assured conservative voters that he supports the privatization of the health-care system and favors lower taxes and less government control.

McCain also remarked on the competitive market in Wichita and all of Kansas supports.

As president, McCain vowed to "open every market in the world for Kansas products because [Kansas] is home to some of the "world's most productive and effective workers."

McCain also touched on his plan to eliminate wasteful spending and in turn he hopes to give every child in America a $1,000 tax credit.

With a metal bracelet engraved with the name of a fallen soldier on his wrist, McCain turned his focus to the war in Iraq. Once a picture of the evil found in Iraq had been painted, McCain countered the Democratic plan for Iraq.

"If we had set a date to get out like [Sen. Barack] Obama [D-Ill.] and [Sen. Hillary] Clinton [D-N.Y.] wanted, al-Qaeda would be celebrating our defeat and surrender," McCain said.

McCain also said through his experiences, the judgment and voice of Iraq Multi-National Force Commanding General David Petraeus is more important than someone seeking a higher political office and the U.S. will have success in Iraq over time.

He also said he will do everything in his power to make sure the troops' deaths are not in vain.

McCain closed by saying most importantly, as president, he hopes to inspire Americans to serve a cause greater than their own self-interests.

Kansas voters had the chance to take McCain's words to heart as they voted in the Republican caucuses on Saturday, where he came in second to former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

TO THE EDITOR

GOP, caucus attendance disappoint K-State student

Editor,

I attended the Kansas GOP Caucus Saturday morning, and I feel that I am obligated to express my sincerest disappointment in what I witnessed this weekend. The GOP leadership and the party members continue to discourage my values and test my patience. Some of my worst fears about the GOP were realized, and I am convinced that the Kansas GOP has lost its way.

Looking around at the caucus I noticed only a dozen or so college-aged voters, and a disproportionate number of elderly, white men. A Grand Old Party indeed. Moreover, the lackluster crowd only totaled a few hundred people and zero new members were enrolled. This is in comparison to the 1,200 Democratic caucus-goers and nearly 600 new Democratic members that enrolled in a single hour on Super Tuesday. This is a trend that is seen throughout the U.S., and a trend I do not see slowing. We are losing, and losing bad.

As for specific cases of incredible idiocy from Saturday, there are many. For one, a question was raised on the differences between the Fair Tax and the Flat Tax and the candidates' positions thereon. A GOP leader fielded the question by saying that these two completely different tax ideas are the same thing.

The crowd nodded in acceptance. Also, a comment was made about why some Middle-Easterners hate Americans. The commentator suggested that they hate America because we interfere with their country — a noble, thought-provoking idea. In response another gentleman asserted that they hate America because of our religion — a less intelligent, yet valid remark. But finally an older man grabbed the microphone and stated, "They hate us because they hate us!" — an unintelligible, absurd statement. And even so, the crowd clapped and cheered as if an unmistakable truth had just been phrased. This was sickening and yet was the hallmark of the entire event.

So what's wrong? Polls show, and I believe, that the GOP has lost most of its long-standing credibility as the party of small government, low taxes, strong national defense (which cannot be confused with strong national offense), free enterprise, liberty and freedom. Therefore, I implore you, dear GOP, mend your broken ways and become a party I can be proud of once again.

Huckabee sends message of victory to Kansas, veterans

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. — Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., might carry the title "presumptive Republican nominee," but Friday in Olathe, Kan., former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee sent a message that he was still standing.

Huckabee

"We still believe there's a chance I can win this thing," McCain's chief remaining rival told reporters at MidAmerica Nazarene University one day before Kansas' GOP caucuses. "Nobody has 1,191 delegates, and until somebody has that, we don't have a nominee." In Wichita about four hours later, McCain accepted Huckabee's challenge.

"We can win in Kansas," McCain said.

All the personal attention from presidential candidates is rare for Kansas, which typically picks its delegates long after party nominees are known.

In addition to the McCain and Huckabee visits Friday, Democratic candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., visited El Dorado, Kan., shortly before Kansas Democrats had their caucuses on Super Tuesday.

The GOP contests came just two days after former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney suspended his presidential candidacy, a move that presents the GOP with two main choices for the first time. Rep. Ron Paul of Texas also remains in the race.

Huckabee trails McCain in delegates, though he won five states on Super Tuesday.

Nevertheless, Huckabee signaled Friday that he still wanted to win by scheduling stops in Wichita, Topeka and Garden City, Kan., besides the Olathe visit.

Before a crowd of hundreds in Olathe, Huckabee chased after conservative votes by insisting that he is the only candidate left who is "unflinchingly" pro-life, pro-traditional marriage and pro-simplified tax code.

"I look forward to being the president who nails a going-out-of-business sign to the front door of the IRS," he said.

Huckabee also pledged to better serve America's veterans, saying he would break up every monument in Washington and sell off the pieces to support them.

Though some in the audience applauded Huckabee's decision to remain in the race, not all did.

"I think he's hurting his party," said the Rev. Ron Jackson. "If they want to win, they've got to unify."

In Wichita, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback introduced McCain. Brownback endorsed McCain after he ended his own White House bid. Brownback sought to assure voters that McCain has legitimate conservative credentials, with a 24-year record of anti-abortion votes and support of gun rights.

"To know what he is going through with his family and his mom and for him to still be with us is real special. That just shows how strong Clent is." — Michael Beasley, FRESHMAN FORWARD

Family business

K-State extends conference record to 7-1

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior guard Clent Stewart didn't play for K-State Saturday against Oklahoma State, but he showed up to support the Wildcats on the bench.

It was support No. 20 K-State (17-5, 7-1 Big 12) needed to survive a physical game as the Wildcats rolled to victory over the Cowboys 82-61 at Bramlage Coliseum, their first win over Oklahoma State (11-12, 2-7 Big 12) in five years.

Whether Stewart would attend the game Saturday was unknown to players or coaches, but K-State athletic director Tim Weiser arranged for Stewart to return to Manhattan from his mother's funeral service in Oklahoma, if he chose to. Stewart arrived 10 minutes before the game started.

"To know what he is going through with his family and his mom and for him to still be with us is real special. That just shows how strong Clent is," said freshman forward Michael Beasley. "He told us he might be coming today but I didn't believe him because I wouldn't come, given the circumstances. It just shows how much Clent cares about the team."

"We're family. We're not a basketball team. We're brothers, [and] the coaching staff, we are just one big family, and that's how we have to play."

K-State coach Frank Martin said though Stewart was back, he felt it wouldn't be right to ask him if he was ready to play.

"It's not about winning; it's about life, whenever his heart tells him he's good to go," he said. "If we go 0-10 in our last ten games and his heart isn't ready to do it ... for me to even ask him when he wants to play would be an injustice on my part."

The Wildcats opened the game on a 13-2 run with three three-pointers from freshman guard Jacob Pullen. With 13:34 left in the first half, Pullen was four of four on the day from three-point range, giving K-State a 20-10 advantage.

like that a lot more than he does right now," Martin said. "He can't give you two great minutes and two awful minutes. That's where his growth has to come; he's got to learn how to continue to play, continue to stay the course."

As the first half came to a close, Okla-ma State went on a 9-3 run to cut the Wildcats lead to 38-33.

Martin said the team acted like it had gone backwards to where it was in November.

Cats win 4 events in Colorado

By Joel Aschbrenner

In a meet that featured sprinters and field athletes, the K-State track and field team came away from the Don Barrett Air Force Open with four event victories and nine second place finishes.

Leading the way for the Wildcats was senior Donnie Parrish, who took first place in the 60-meter and the 200-meter dashes. Parrish matched her personal best when she clocked a time of 7.51 seconds in the 60-meter dash. She posted a time of 24.23 seconds in the 200-meter dash.

Finishing second to Parrish in both events was senior Marny Honeycutt.

Honeycutt, a Denver native, had a time of 7.60 seconds in the 60-meter dash, and 25.04 seconds in the 200-meter dash.

In the women's weight throw, senior Laci Heller topped her personal best by seven inches with her 66-10.00 toss.

Her throw, which was the sixth longest in the nation this season, won the event and met the provisional qualifying mark for the NCAA indoor championships. Junior Loren Groves, who has already qualified for the NCAA indoor championships, placed fourth in the event with a throw of 59-11.00.

The only first-place finish for the men came from freshman Emmanuel Neizer in the long jump.

Neizer earned the event victory with a jump of 23-6.00. In the triple jump, Neizer placed second with a personal best distance of 48-2.50.

Junior Mike Myer also collected two second-place finishes for the Wildcats. In the 60-meter dash, Myer set a new personal best when he posted a time of 6.77 seconds. In the 200-meter dash, he finished with a time of 21.41 seconds.

Senior Thomaida Polydorou also produced a second-place finish for the Wildcats when she covered a distance of 40-06.25 in the women's triple jump. Junior Nancy Harrington cleared a height of 12-07.50 in the women's pole vault to place second in the event.

The women's 4x400-meter relay also posted a second place finish with a time of 3:56.11.

Junior Scott Sellers cleared the bar at 7-02.25 in the high jump to earn another second place finish for the Wildcats.

She beat her personal best twice last week at the Seignie Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., and topped it again this week when she posted a time of 8.78.

K-State defeats in-state rivalry KU in hard-fought win

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team held off a pesky Kansas squad Saturday, 64-58, proving once again records are meaningless when playing in a rivalry game.

In a game in which both teams shot less than 40 percent from the field, the intensity of the play for the in-state battle was thick. It was such a hard-fought game that sophomore forward Ashley Sweat received a scratch on her right arm when she came out for the second half.

The Wildcats (16-6, 8-1 Big 12), had chances to take control of the game, but the Jayhawks kept clawing their way back. With about a minute left, senior forward Marlies Gipson iced the game by hitting four free throws down the stretch. Gipson finished with 20 points and 15 rebounds.

"She's pretty much amazing," said senior guard Kimberly Dietz about Gipson's performance.

Dietz added 15 points and also six assists.

Even with Gipson's and Dietz's performances, the Wildcats couldn't pull away from the Jayhawks, but it didn't surprise K-State coach Deb Patterson.

"From our perspective, it's Big 12 basketball," Patterson said. "I was most pleased that in critical situations individual players stepped up and made big plays."

Once again, Gipson was one of those individuals who stepped up when her team needed her to, leaving Patterson wondering if there's anything Gipson can't do for the Wildcats.

"She walks off the floor eight-for-16 - 50 percent from the floor. She shoots perfect from the foul line, she finishes the night with a double-double, she spent 38 minutes of the game defending a six-foot-five player and in the last six minutes of the game she took the game over," Patterson said. "I don't know if there is anything else that you can ask her to do."

Saturday's game also was the second day of "Think Pink" week, where teams across the country wore pink to raise awareness for breast cancer. Patterson said the bottom line is the need for making young people and people across the community aware.

"The game is secondary to the fact that, as a sport, women's basketball could make a statement about working to draw attention to the cause of preventing and curing cancer," Patterson said.

The Wildcats have recently felt what it's like to lose someone to cancer with the death of Vanessa Stewart, mother of men's basketball player Clent Stewart. The Wildcats all wore her initials on their wristbands during the game. Junior guard Shalee Lehning said she and the rest of the Wildcats weren't playing just for themselves against KU.

"We know Clent very well," Lehning said. "We weren't playing just for our team and our family - we were playing for Vanessa."

New Yankee Stadium to cost $1.3 billion, slated to open in 2009

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK - The new Yankee Stadium will have party suites, a members-only restaurant, a martini bar and a price tag to match all the luxury - $1.3 billion, up from the original estimate of $1 billion.

"We tried to reflect a five-star hotel and put a ballfield in the middle," said Yankees chief operating officer Lonnie Trost, who hosted a media tour Thursday.

The new ballpark, set to be ready for the 2009 season, is directly across the street from the old House that Ruth Built. The site is now a welter of cranes and construction trailers, with hard-hatted workers patrolling the infield.

The granite and limestone exterior is designed to evoke Yankee Stadium when it opened in 1923, before it was remodeled in the 1970s.

But inside there will be amenities unheard of in Babe Ruth's day - or in Reggie Jackson's.

There will be a conference area with video conferencing so that a corporate group could have a daylong meeting and then stay for a game. A concierge will be available to procure theater tickets or restaurant reservations. There will be 51 luxury suites, two large outdoor suites and eight party suites with seating for up to 410 people in total.

The 58-by-103-foot center field television screen will be six times the size of the video screen at the current stadium.

The dimensions of the field will be the same as at the old ballpark, which will be partially demolished.

Trost said the cost overruns included $150 million in enhancements such as the giant video screen, $138 million in food and beverage costs not included in the original estimate and $50 million from delays due to a lawsuit by community groups that sought to halt construction of the stadium.

um.

The community groups sued because two city parks were razed to make way for the new stadium. The Yankees have said the lost parkland would be replaced at the site of the old stadium and elsewhere in the Bronx.

Asked if the Yankees had been securing additional financing, Trost said, "We will be."

The Mets' new ballpark, CitiField, remains on budget at $800 million and on schedule to open in 2009. While the new Yankee Stadium will hold about 53,000 fans, CitiField will have a capacity of approximately 42,500.

Combatives course now open to all students

By Krystle Richard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The room was humid as sweat dripped from their pores. The gray T-shirts clung to their bodies. Some faces displayed grimaces, others looked triumphant as they attempted to overpower their partner.

This was the scene in Ahearn Field House during a KSU Modern Combatives class, which the College of Arts and Sciences has now opened to the general student population, said David Durnil, combatives instructor.

Alyssa Mattox, junior in biology, said she took the class because she wanted to learn more than just the techniques taught in self-defense classes.

"This is applicable to a real fight," she said. "I learned I was at a serious size disadvantage, but I learned how to hold off an attacker until help comes."

Size and gender have little importance in the combative course. The class is gender mixed with both men and women all having a range of body types.

On the coed nature of the course, Durnil said the class does not tolerate sexual harassment. Mattox, one of two women in the course, said it's no different than fighting her brothers at home; however, a women's only self-defense course also is available.

Durnil said he was proud the class has a diversity of students.

"It's expanded how the material applies to our lives," he said.

Scott Lange, sophomore in marketing, said though he's a peaceful person, it's important to know how to properly defend against an attack.

"You can really tell a difference," he said. "You know how effective it is to get in the right position." During the class, students are paired and at the command of the instructor they confront each other as if they're in a real attack. The risk of injury is low, said Durnil, who explained what is called the "sparring ethic."

"It's where we take care of each other," he said. "They learn specific safety training, like tapping out, which tells the other person if they're feeling pain."

An injury of one student would ultimately affect the class as a whole, he said.

Students also gain knowledge beyond the physical techniques. Durnil encourages the students to expand their perspectives about martial arts; it includes more than kung-fu and karate.

"Try not to limit yourselves to just Eastern ideas," he said. "Martial art is like language, it's universal to each culture."

Students learn the history of martial arts, combative force and lawful use of force in the class.

Though the combatives class is less rigorous than the military course, Durnil said it is not an easy A. Students are graded on two technique tests, attendance, participation and attitude.

Austin Waldo, sophomore in business administration, said the best way to be successful in the combatives class is to remember that practice makes perfect.

"It makes you stop and think about what you're doing," he said.

While many might think there are ill feelings between the military and non-military students, Durnil said the majority of them already are friends, or in the same fraternity or organization.

"The knowledge of the course spreads through the people it was intended to serve," he said. "It's legitimacy to others."

Stephen Warner, senior in architecture and an ROTC cadet, came to observe the course. "I think it's a great program that builds confidence and discipline," Warner said.

Warner said he plans to take the course for the military, and though the teaching styles are different, the concepts are the same.

"It teaches you about how to protect yourself if you ever get in a bad situation," he said. "It's either us or them."

Though each student enrolled in the combatives class has his or her own reason for the class, they all work together to learn the self-defense maneuvers.

Mattox, who usually works late and walks home, said her motivation was simple:

"I got tired of being scared."

Increase in hit-and-runs prompts RCPD database

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department is building a database to incorporate all of the local auto-parts stores and vehicle repair shops to assist in locating hit-and-run offenders.

"We'll get a call from one of the police investigators to look for a specific car two or three times a year," said Russ Keys, owner of RC Auto Body.

The RCPD spent a great deal of time responding to minor traffic accidents in the recent months because of sporadic weather conditions. Along with responding to standard traffic accidents, they have also responded to accidents in which the victim returns to their parked vehicle to find it damaged.

"Sometimes we have accidents happen late at night or in parking lots," RCPD officer Lori Axton said.

Officer David Etter said he remembers being on duty the night of Jan. 16. The roads were slick, and even Etter had trouble negotiating the streets. Etter said he and his fellow officers were busy all night responding to minor traffic accidents caused by the icy streets.

Paul Bergersen said he left his 1967 Mustang and 1981 Corvette parked in his driveway the morning of Jan. 16. When Bergersen returned home the following Sunday, he found both vehicles totaled, with damages estimated between $15,000 and $20,000.

The driver of the vehicle that hit Bergersen's vehicles did not leave any contact information nor did the driver contact the police. Both of these acts are misdemeanors, but offenses that are taken seriously by Etter.

"I enjoy the hunt," Etter said. "When I investigate something, I spend hours following leads, even if it is an $8 gas skip."

Bergersen said he is upset because police have not found the person or persons responsible.

"The police aren't doing much to help," Bergersen said.

Etter said he also feels the frustration in the investigation.

"All we are looking for at this point is a red car," Etter said. "I've ran all the leads I can reasonably run."

Axton, who is in charge of completing the database, said other problems hamper investigations. Sometimes there are no witnesses or no parts from the offending vehicle left at the scene, like the situation with Bergersen's case.

The database being compiled by Axton and others only will assist in finding offending vehicles that lose parts at the scene. Axton said the police department must rely on witnesses to help find the perpetrators in any investigation, not just hit-and-run cases.

Axton said he encourages hit-and-run witnesses to gather as much information as they can. The color, make and model of the vehicles involved helps identify offenders. Axton also said if witnesses would remain on scene until an officer arrives and to take their statement, it helps in the search efforts.

Meals cooked at home offer healthier, cheaper options

Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students don't need a culinary education, a huge budget or many utensils to set up a basic outfitted kitchen, said a K-State extension associate.

Students should expect to spend between $100-$200 on a basic kitchen set, said Karen Blakeslee, extension associate in the Food Science Institute with K-State Research and Extension. Blakeslee also said students' investments depend on how much they can afford and where they shop.

"If you're looking to buy a skillet or pots and pans, make sure they are a heavy-gauge stainless steel," she said. "Some of them – if they are really light – can bend and warp, which isn't good. Get the best that you can afford, if you want it to last awhile."

Blakeslee also said college students should include a basic cookbook with their kitchen collections, like a Betty Crocker or Better Homes and Gardens cookbook.

"I think those are pretty tried-and-true with basic recipes," Blakeslee said. "If you're new to the kitchen, that's a good place to start."

A basic kitchen setup is a great way for students to cook for themselves and save money from eating at restaurants, Blakeslee said.

"Nutrition-wise, you can control how much fat and salt you put into products, and cooking at home is a lot cheaper than buying food at a restaurant a lot of the time," she said. "If your friends are around, have them join in. Take an hour or so, take a break from everything and cook yourself a meal. It can be pretty satisfying."

Megan Leonard, senior in bakery science management and K-State Bakery Science club president, also said a basic kitchen can help college students cook simple meals.

"If you can't go out, you have the things to impress your someone, like your boyfriend or girlfriend, and show them that you know how to cook," said Leonard, senior in bakery science and management.

HOW TO SET UP A KITCHEN

According to the Food Network Kitchens' "How to Boil Water: Life Beyond Takeout," a beginner's cookbook, people don't need many materials to setup a kitchen.

Instead, people should purchase tools that fit their style of cooking, how many people they cook for and the kind of food they cook, according to the book.

Sharon Davis, family and consumer sciences educator and consultant for the Home Baking Association, said she recommends the following utensils and supplies because most recipes call for them.

College students don't need many supplies to outfit a kitchen, but these are the basic necessities, she said.

SLOTTED SPOON

Davis said slotted spoons help scoop out foods that are cooked in large amounts of water, like simmering shrimp. Students also should have a separate, bigger spoon that is high-heat resistant, Davis said. While high-heat plastic spoons cost more, they also will last longer, she said.

ONE-QUART AND TWO-QUART SAUCE PANS

A one-quart sauce pan is recommended for cooking soups, Davis said. Large-sized pans also are ideal for cooking foods like mashed potatoes, she said.

PIZZA PANS

These pans are multipurpose because they also are used to cook cookies and flat breads, Davis said. However, if students choose to bake other foods on a pizza pan, they should have at least two in their collection, Davis said.

12-INCH SKILLET

Skillets make foods like omelets and crepes, and Davis said students should invest in cast-iron skillets because they last a lifetime. To wash cast iron, Davis said students should use boiled water.

MISCELLANEOUS

Blakeslee, Leonard and Davis also said the following utensils are important basic necessities in college students' kitchens:

- measuring cups for dry ingredients and liquids
- measuring spoons
- mixing bowls
- can opener
- several pot holders
- cutting boards
- spatula

SEX AND THE CITY: THE LITTLE APPLE

Postponing sex can heighten desires, extend relationship

There's the good, the bad and the times that just don't count.

Sex: it's big. For some, it's bigger than big. Yet for many college students, sex is as routine as sloshing around Aggieville on a Saturday night.

Like any routine, sex can get old and become a game of countdown quickies and weekend flings. It's a rushed game where between-the-sheets throw-downs evolve into bored, tired slowdowns.

In three days, millions will indulge in the most overplayed hand-holding holiday of the year – Valentine's Day. While many are equipped with the world's finest dark chocolates, plush teddy bears and sparkly jewelry, there is one gift that can rocket any relationship into a fabulous world of sexual escapades: anticipation.

A dear friend of mine last week called me to tell me that a great guy had asked her out. Though a skeptic, I wished her the best for the date, only to learn that a few days later she had done the deed – she and the new guy had sex.

It wasn't entirely shocking to hear. I mean, many 20-somethings engage in sex, even before that first date. Yet, they often overlook what they risk by dipping into a pool of unknowns – who that person is, that person's hobbies, weird habits, etc. I'd rather know my date's middle name before I know if he likes to be on top.

Rushed into a dating frenzy, college students overlook the power of anticipation – the power of the lack of sex. After all, it's the kiss she didn't get on the first date that will keep the woman talking – believe me.

Last year, I started dating a man I'd known for years at K-State. One night, we were hanging out, joking around. He touched my arm, and in that moment, I knew he wanted me, and I wanted him back. I felt like I was 16, equipped with love butterflies in the pit of my stomach. We kissed. Again, deeper, more passionate. I giggled. More kissing. It was nice, but I knew if I caved in and had sex, it would be all our relationship would amount to. I excused myself for the evening, walked myself home and the next day, he gave me a call. We started dating.

Repressing desire can only make it more powerful. In the case of this man, and a number of others, holding back can give you more. You should know the person you're lying next to at night. If you aren't aware of those little things that make relationships last, then you're only digging yourself a grave in a sexually frustrated cemetery.

Whether you're a sexual neophyte or veteran many-years-running, experiment with your sexual anticipation. Hold out for that first kiss – or even better – anchor into the kiss by kissing the person's cheeks, forehead, eyelids, etc. Once you've got the kissing down, do the same for intercourse or other sexual acts. Nothing's better than a guy calling you, saying "I've got a surprise for you tonight," and you don't have a clue. It can be nice to know what's coming, but when the reward is dangled bait, it can definitely stimulate the mind and body more.

It's not that sex isn't great. It is. And it's very special for two people to finally decide to engage in it. But you've got to be careful, not just to heighten your sexual desires, but also to give yourself room to learn and appreciate that experience even more. Anticipation doesn't mean you have to make yourself a little "Dawson's Creek" teen, smushed between a verbally robust world filled with sexual angst. It just means wait a little while. String out the foreplay and intensify the experience. Sometimes sex isn't enough, and, somehow, the lack of sex speaks louder than the act itself. A sex column about not having sex – now that's something to talk about.

Writer's Guild

LOS ANGELES – Hollywood writers were optimistic they could end a three-month strike that has crippled the entertainment industry after reviewing a proposed deal from studios that increases their payments for online use of TV shows and movies. Leaders of the Writers Guild of America recommended the deal Saturday to thousands of members gathered on both coasts, and warned that holding out for a better deal might be disastrous.

Modern version of Valentine's cards far from humble death-row origin

Valentine's Day has always been recognized as the day of roses, chocolate and, of course, Valentine cards. But few people take the time to stop and think about how much work actually goes into making those cards.

The following article is from the Feb. 12, 1982, Collegian written by Charlene Farrell.

A message scrawled to a lover from a death-row convict in 269 A.D. has turned into one of the largest profit-making traditions for the greeting card industry.

Valentine's Day — when lovers express their deepest feelings, when friends and relatives remember those they care about, when grade-schoolers twitter in the corner over the valentine received by their newest sweetheart.

People quarrel over the origin of Valentine's Day, but the most widely accepted belief is the story of St. Valentine.

While awaiting execution for being a Christian martyr, St. Valentine fell in love with the blind daughter of his jailer. Through his faith he restored her sight. He signed his farewell message to her "from your Valentine," a phrase that has become an everlasting symbol of friendship, affection, caring and love.

Since the earliest known valentine, sent in 1415, there have been some dramatic changes.

The lace, the frills, the sweetly rhymed messages have always been classified as traditional valentines. Such cards are still part of the valentine tradition, but slowly a new style is expanding in the market.

John Dinardo, manager of public information at Hallmark Cards Inc., Kansas City, Mo., said the traditional valentines seem to be losing ground to straight-forward prose and more graphics.

"It's a concept held over from the '60s when there was a reaction to anything sensing of sweetness, which depicted insincerity," Dinardo said. It's back to the concept of "telling it like it is," he added.

Hearts and cupids will never leave the market, according to Dinardo, but other designs are becoming prevalent. Oriental designs and photography are fast becoming best sellers.

Another reason for this trend away from frills and sweetness is the change in the greeting-card consumers' age.

"The majority [of buyers] are in their late 20s, early 30s," Dinardo said. "They are more sophisticated."

Also influencing the change in cards has been the influx of women into the job market.

"They are no longer male-dominated verses," Dinardo said. The cards don't praise women for household duties or womanly charms anymore, but rather for being a good friend, partner and companion.

Valentine's Day is one of the few occasions that men buy cards, Dinardo said. It's not surprising that they buy cards, but it is surprising to discover what kinds of cards they do buy.

"Men will buy the most sentimental, mushy, loving cards," Dinardo said. "The words have to be just right."

Women approach the day in a sort of casual and blasé manner, he said.

They buy the most comical cards and don't feel like the world will crumble if they can't find a card just right for their tastes, he added.

According to a Hallmark publication, there used to be one rule of thumb to follow when designing a valentine: "Make it any color ... as long as it's red."

No longer will you be able to enter a card shop and find the rows and rows of red-and-white valentines typical of every other year.

Burgundy and blue seem to be the popular off-colors this year, Dinardo said.

The color change arose mainly out of boredom, he said. An off-colored card shows contrast, catches a buyer's eye and produces the best results.

Finding just the right card may be a tedious process, but few know the work they are rejecting when they place a card back on the shelf.

Each card goes through 300 steps involving 3,000 people. The plans are sent from Hallmark in Kansas City to various Hallmark production companies throughout the country. The cards come back in the form of lithographic sheets. The sheets are cut, flocked, flittered, coated, dyed, glued, laminated, embossed, die cut, engraved, glossed and printed.

From the original idea to the finished product, the process takes 18 months.

Many Hallmark artists and writers are now working on cards for Easter 1984.

"Ask an artist what year it is, and they'll usually have to stop and think," Dinardo said.

How do those employees get inspired about Valentine's Day in the heat of July, or Easter in February?

A big help is Hallmark's project kickoff. Card designers get together and do skits, plays, slide presentations — anything to help set the mood for the occasion.

The inspired artists then go back to a unique working environment, which includes fountains, skylights and 1,400 plants. Hallmark developed this environment to study the creativity level of artists in relation to their surroundings.

"We wanted to see what makes an artist create better," Dinardo said. The experimental room is somewhat isolated.

Artists have no phones to interrupt them and can make occasional phone calls from one of the few Old-English phone-booths.

Because the experiment is producing positive results, eventually all of the writers and artists will be in similar surroundings, Dinardo said.

With double-digit inflation, most people find it difficult to spend money on "extras."

The economy has made it difficult for people to send roses, or buy candy or gifts — not only on Valentine's Day, but for Christmas and birthdays also.

"The economy actually helps [Hallmark]," Dinardo said. "It's sort of a double windfall."

To cut down on expenses, consumers will send cards, Dinardo said. And to make up for not buying a gift, consumers will buy a more expensive card, he added.

Probably each one of the 1,520 different types of Hallmark valentines will appeal to someone this year — whether poetic, graphic, frilly, conversational or comical. But all the different tastes will never blot out the unique quality of a greeting card: It is the only item always purchased to be given to someone else.

WORLD BRIEFS

ISRAEL WILL NOT USE MORE MILITARY FORCE IN GAZA STRIP

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert ruled out a broad military operation on Sunday in the Gaza Strip, deflecting rising anger after an 8-year-old boy lost a leg in a Palestinian rocket attack.

But Israel's top diplomat warned it will be impossible to reach a peace agreement with Palestinians as long as the Hamas rulers of Gaza continue to foment violence.

"Anger is not an operational plan," Olmert said in response to clamoring for a full-scale invasion of northern Gaza to take over the areas where militants have been launching the rockets. There were calls from the Cabinet for assassinating Hamas political leaders.

Residents of the battered town of Sderot near Gaza blocked the main highway entrance into Jerusalem as the Cabinet met. They demanded government action after doctors amputated Osher Twito's leg following a rocket attack that also wounded his 19-year-old brother.

"He loves playing soccer, but he will never play again," Osher's mother, Iris Twito, wailed on Channel 2 TV. "How can he play now with no leg?"

Over the weekend, with growing defiance and confidence, Hamas militants called on Israelis to flee from border towns as the rockets rained down. The two brothers were wounded Saturday night when a rocket exploded next to them in Sderot, one of dozens that hit in and near the town of 20,000 less half a mile from the fence around Gaza.

THOUSANDS FLEE SUDAN OVER THE WEEKEND, SEEK REFUGE IN CHAD

GENEVA — As many as 12,000 refugees fled Sudan's Darfur region to neighboring Chad over the weekend following air strikes by the Sudanese military and thousands more might come, the U.N. refugee agency said Sunday.

The agency brought emergency assistance to the Chad border where the Darfur refugees gave detailed descriptions of air attacks Friday on three West Darfur towns.

The refugees are "destitute and terrified," said Helene Caux, spokeswoman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees headquartered in Geneva. "They told of their villages being looted and burned, and encircled by militia."

U.N. officials say the worsening situation in Darfur has been exacerbated by a recent rebel attack on the capital of neighboring Chad. Chad has accused Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir of backing those rebels in a bid to prevent deployment of a European peacekeeping force in the Chad-Sudan border region where some 400,000 refugees are living.

Sudan's Arab-dominated government has been accused of unleashing more attacks by its allied janjaweed militias, which are accused of committing the worst atrocities against Darfur's ethnic African communities. At least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced since the violence began five years ago.

CHAVEZ THREATENS TO CUT OFF OIL SALES TO U.S.

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chavez on Sunday threatened to cut off oil sales to the United States in an "economic war" if Exxon Mobil Corp. wins court judgments to seize billions of dollars in Venezuelan assets.

Exxon Mobil has gone after the assets of state oil company Petroleos de Venezuela SA in U.S., British and Dutch courts as it challenges the nationalization of a multibillion dollar oil project by Chavez's government.

A British court has issued an injunction "freezing" as much as $12 billion in assets.

"If you end up freezing (Venezuelan assets) and it harms us, we're going to harm you," Chavez said during his weekly radio and television program, "Hello, President." "Do you know how? We aren't going to send oil to the United States. Take note, Mr. Bush, Mr. Danger."

Chavez has repeatedly threatened to cut off oil shipments to the United States, which is Venezuela's No. 1 client, if Washington tries to oust him. Chavez's warnings on Sunday appeared to extend that threat to attempts by oil companies to challenge his government's nationalization drive through lawsuits.

"I speak to the U.S. empire, because that's the master — continue and you will see that we won't sent one drop of oil to the empire of the United States," Chavez said Sunday.

NORWAY CLOSES EMBASSY BECAUSE OF THREATS OF TERRORISM

OSLO, Norway — Norway closed its embassy in the Afghan capital because of terror threats Sunday, nearly one month after a Norwegian journalist was among eight people killed in a suicide attack on a luxury hotel in Kabul.

The Nordic nation, which recently said it would send more troops to the NATO force in Afghanistan, has been singled out at least twice as a potential target by al-Qaida.

"The embassy has been closed down today due to terror threats," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Kristin Melsom said.

She would not describe the threats and said it was too early to say how long the embassy would be closed.

A reporter for the Norwegian newspaper Dagbladet was among those killed when militants with suicide vests, grenades and AK-47 rifles attacked the Serena hotel in Kabul on Jan. 15. Norway's foreign minister was in the hotel at the time, but he was unhurt and later said he did not think the attack was aimed at him.

Nevertheless, the attack likely led Norway to review the threat level against its interests in Afghanistan, said Arne Strand, an Afghanistan expert at the Christian Michelsen Institute in Bergen, Norway's second biggest city.

Women's doubles, singles teams dominate in sweep over Billikens

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team posted a solid performance Saturday at Ahearn Field House, topping the Saint Louis Billikens, 7-0.

Such dominance was first evident in the new doubles team of freshman Antea Huljev and senior Viviana Yrureta. The duo breezed through Rachel McCullagh and Tara Grant, 8-0. In the No. 3 spot, freshmen Pauline Guernas and Vanessa Cottin topped Joe Becker and Caitlin McKenna, 8-1.

The No. 1 doubles team of junior Katerina Kudlackova and senior Olga Klimova had some early trouble with the Billikens' Amanda Hellberg and Casey Miller, falling behind 2-0 early before rallying for an 8-3 win. Coach Steve Bietau said improvement is key to avoid situations like that from happening.

"They just had a slow start," he said. "I wish they didn't have a slow start, but sometimes it happens. The important thing is, and I know they understand it, is to improve."

Overall, Bietau said he was pleased with the doubles play. "They did a good job taking care of business," he said. "We had a slow start, but once they overcame it, it was no problem."

Little changed in singles play. The Wildcats continually dispatched their Billikens opponents quickly. Yrureta beat Hellberg, 7-5, 6-3; Cottin defeated Grant, 6-2, 6-0; Kudlackova overpowered McCullagh, 6-2, 6-0; Huljev topped Miller, 6-3, 6-2; and Klimova bested McKenna, 6-1, 6-4.

Sophomore Natasha Vieira, playing in the No. 4 spot, faced a more formidable challenge from the Billikens' Becker. The two battled back and forth before Vieira came out victorious 6-4, 6-7 (7-4), 6-3. Bietau also had positive things to say about the singles performances.

"Generally pretty good," he said. "I thought they really played well at one and made Vivi (Yrureta) work and she did. We moved Natasha up a spot today just to give her a little tougher match and she got it and came through and did a nice job – so, just a pretty good job taking care of business."

Going into Tuesday's match-up against the Wichita State Shockers, Bietau said that the perpetual problems of where to place players are lessening with time.

"We have a good idea of where people are right now," he said. "But we have some positions that I think can be changed depending on a player might be at one position in the line-up today and just because of a match-up. So the good thing is there is competition for spots and having more than one option available. I have a good idea of what our line-up is now but that doesn't mean it won't change."

The Wildcats, 2-0 for the first time since 2003, will return to action at 5 p.m. Tuesday at Ahearn Field House against the No. 33-ranked Shockers.

At the end of the day, Bietau said he was fairly satisfied with the decisive win over the Billikens.

"I'd say it was a pretty good performance," he said. "It was a kind of match where you are not going to play great. But I was pleased with how we played."

AMBASSADOR | Chinese students to see speaker

of some toys with significant amounts of lead and tainted pet food China has exported to the U.S.

"Some Chinese businesses particularly have been a problem – the kind of business that want to make some money quick, so they may be cutting corners," Lu said.

Lu also acknowledged that U.S. businesses also can do that.

Though China still is a communist government, Lu said relations between the U.S. and China have improved out of necessity.

"Right now, the relationship is simply that both countries need each other," Lu said. "The United States just can't solve many of the problems without China's help, like the nuclear issue in the Korean peninsula or the problem in Darfur, Sudan."

Lu also said the U.S. needs China's cooperation on the United Nation's Security Council. He said China needs several U.S. products and also its knowledge of technology.

Lu said problems arise, though, because China wants to import many products, like F-16s and high-technology computers, that the U.S. will not give the county.

"The relationship can be better, but I think it's pretty good," Lu said.

Lu, who has taken students to China several times in the past few years, said many Chinese people show respect for the U.S.

"Overall, I think a lot of people admire the economic goals, the standard of living, the pop culture and obviously the military power," he said.

Lu said the American influence is obvious almost anywhere in China. He said Chinese people use American cars, dress like Americans in jeans, a T-shirt and a baseball cap, and eat at American restaurants.

"I went to the Eastern part of Tibet, and it literally was on the middle of nowhere – very sparsely populated, mountainous – and all of a sudden I saw a sign on the side of the highway that said 'Budweiser.'"

Reagan said Chinese students will get the opportunity to meet the Chinese ambassador at a lunch Tuesday morning, but no seats will be reserved for the lecture.

"We really value the opportunity to meet him and also show him what it's like here at K-State for Chinese students," said Xiaobao Dang, graduate student in economics.

Dang said the two countries have many similarities and many differences, but there is much the two countries can learn from each other.

Ambassador Zhou will be the third foreign ambassador to speak in the Landon Lecture Series since 2005 – Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki Al-Faisal spoke in January 2007 and Japanese ambassador Ryozo Kato spoke in October 2005.

Reagan said the attendance at those lectures was strong and the crowds responded positively to the ambassadors' messages.

"I think people were very interested with what they had to say about world events and the relations between the U.S. and their country," he said.

Zhou's lecture originally was scheduled for Oct. 10, 2007, but was rescheduled at the ambassador's request. Reagan said a question-and-answer session will follow the hour-long lecture.

MEN | Wildcats top Cowboys in rebounds

"We started belly-aching and worrying about what was being called," he said. "I told them, 'Men, we've come a long way, why are we back in November again? Why? You guys have grown. We've grown. It's a physical game, they're letting you play. Be a man, grow up, deal with it' and our guys did."

K-State opened the second half on an 8-0 run to begin pulling away from the Cowboys. With under ten minutes to play, the Wildcats went on a 9-3 run to open up a 72-51 lead.

The Wildcats dominated the battle on the boards, out-rebounding the Cowboys 51-29. K-State had 29 offensive rebounds in the contest. Beasley finished the game with 23 points and 13 rebounds for his 19th double-double, a new K-State single-season record. Pullen supported K-State's win with 17 points and freshman forward Bill Walker had 14.

Junior guard Terrel Harris led the Cowboys in scoring with 16 points off the bench and freshman guard James Anderson scored 14. K-State will play Texas Tech at 8 p.m. Wednesday in Lubbock, Texas, at the United Spirit Arena.

CAUCUS | Local residents participate

"typical audience" and a fairly representative with age and race diversity.

In contrast to Saturday's 439 participants, more than 1,000 people participated in Riley County's Democratic caucus Tuesday at the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

"I think considering one of the major candidates had dropped out earlier in the week, it was a good turnout," Bagby said. "It went fairly quickly when the candidates started to speak, and it was a very pleasant morning."

The Kansas caucus results will determine the presidential candidate who Kansas delegates will support at the Republican National Convention in September 2008, according to the state party's Web site. To win the Kansas delegates, a candidate must win the majority vote in two of the four Congressional Districts.

The Republican Party requires a total of 1,191 delegates to capture the nomination at the Republican National Convention in September 2008.

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani; Former Ambassador and Author Alan Keyes; Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former Tennessee Sen. Fred Thompson also appeared on Saturday's ballot.

Giuliani and Thompson have officially dropped out of the race, but caucus participants could still vote for them. Though Romney suspended his presidential campaign Thursday, he received nine votes at the Riley County caucus.

According to a www.CNN.com article Thursday, a campaign suspension has a different meaning for each party. With Republicans, decisions on how to allocate delegates are left to the state parties, according to the article.

Riley County also received 33 provisional ballots, which will be determined at the Republican National Convention this fall, Bagby said.

Huckabee also won in Louisiana's primary election Saturday and came in second place in Washington. Three more primaries will take place Tuesday with 113 total pledged delegates at stake in Washington, D.C., Maryland and Virginia.

Though no official voting took place for them, several Manhattan and state representative candidates also were present at Saturday's caucus.

To participate in the caucus, participants must have registered as a Republican in Kansas's Second Congressional District by Jan. 25. Candidate representatives each had 10 minutes to speak on behalf of their candidates. The Kansas Republican Party predetermined the candidates' speaking order.

Because no one spoke officially for Keyes, audience members were granted a question-and-answer and statement period, Bagby said.

The Riley County Republican Party raised more than $800 in donations Saturday for mailing costs, radio advertisements and costs to rent Pottroff hall, Bagby said.

The Riley County Republican Women also had representatives at the caucus. Julia Strawn, Riley County Republican Women president, said the organization has a main goal to inform Riley County residents about Republican candidates at the local, state and national levels.

"Last Tuesday, the Democrats had a caucus," Strawn said. "It was in a snowstorm and they had over 1,100 people there. They registered over 600 new voters. We have a job to do, and we need all of you."

Manhattan resident Dixie Roberts, along with city commissioner Bob Strawn, spoke on behalf of McCain's platform.

"There is no such thing as a perfect candidate," Roberts said. "The Republican Party has been in a struggle, but let us today, in this place, set a course of working together."

Stan Hinehine, a Vietnam War veteran, spoke about Paul as a champion of the Constitution.

"We are the veterans, and we support Ron Paul because we swore an oath to protect and defend the United States of America both foreign and domestic," Hinehine said.

Amy Ward, Manhattan resident, said she participated in the caucus because she had always wondered what a caucus was like and she didn't realize Kansas had a caucus.

"I have always voted, and I've only really worked on one or two campaigns," Ward said. "I felt more included and involved in the process in this caucus today."

Ward said she would participate in future caucuses and was glad the Kansas Republican Party had its caucus on a Saturday.

"I think in a way it gives Kansas a unique position because after Super Tuesday some of the candidates dropped out and so it narrowed the scope of our voting," she said.

Not every Manhattan resident had positive comments about Saturday's caucus. Tim Weninger, graduate student in computer science, said he was disappointed with the Riley County caucus turnout, especially with age representation. Bagby said he had not yet calculated demographics from Saturday's caucus participation.

"If you're trying to build a party or an organization, you've got to recruit the young people," Weninger said. "It's my perception that the Republican Party — my party — is hurting pretty badly."

"My perception before the caucus was that the Republican Party was hurting pretty badly because of the war and the growth in government spending; seeing it [Saturday] just really kind of struck me because there was maybe 5 percent under the age of 35-40 years old."

Weninger said he entered Saturday's caucus without support for a specific candidate.

"I ended up voting for [Ron] Paul because the other candidates seemed out of touch," Weninger said.

Despite his vote for Paul, Weninger said Huckabee's win in Kansas was not a surprise.

"I think there was some apathy among McCain supporters because they feel they've got it won," Weninger said. "In the end, I thought McCain would win, but after seeing the crowd and hearing the supporters, I then thought Huckabee would win. I really think the McCain following thinks they've already got it won."

Coming to K-State not only presented Watkins with new friends but also a variety of new hobbies and a series of untapped skills. At the beginning of his first semester, Watkins was in the K-State Student Union when he realized that the K-State radio station was seeking volunteer help. Luckily for Watkins, the opening happened to be a combination of Watkins' past interests and future calling: Christian hip-hop.

"Nobody really knows about Christian hip-hop so I'm just giving it some exposure. The only thing I'm doing with my show is showing the alternative," Watkins said. "There are actually young people out there who know Christ. There are young people out there just like you that love Christ."

Watkins continues to work as a DJ for KSDB-FM 91.9 and interns at KGGN-AM 890, a gospel station in Gladstone, Mo.

As Watkins DJs, he lets his love for the Lord flow into the microphone.

Hand gestures reach to grasp for an audience that cannot be seen. It is as though Watkins, who refers to himself as DJ Hizway on air, reaches out to hand them a piece of his own full heart.

The message of Christ that pulses through Watkins is not only spread through the waves of radio but he also shares the message through live Christian rap performances. Last year, Watkins and a friend discovered a recording studio in the library and found that rapping came fairly easily for him.

"I'd been rapping since I was little, like third grade. It was just something that felt acceptable to pursue," Watkins said. "Last year I started going in there and making songs and people started actually liking them."

Williams plays the role of friend and devoted fan as Watkins travels to perform his charismatic Christian twist on rap. Williams said Watkins often comes to her with new lyrics to make sure that they are biblically sound. She also operates the video camera at performances.

"You hear how some performers have an alter ego when they're on stage, and I think that's how he is," she said. "He was a really shy person when I met him but when it comes to him rapping he is just on fire. The crowd feels it and he's really rapping about things that he believes. The crowd interacts, and they're just as excited as he is."

Watkins inspires individuals with rap by telling stories of how the Lord has moved through his life. Robert Hall, sophomore in elementary education, is one individual who claims to be bettered by Watkins' influence.

"He's really dedicated to spreading the gospel," Hall said. "He's had a really big impact on my life in the last two years. He's made me strive to do better. I've become a stronger Christian, and he's had a big impact on where I want to go as far as my Christianity. I wish there was more I could do for him."

In the last two years, Watkins has completely turned his life around. No longer caught up in the "party scene," Watkins has opened himself to new experiences centered on embracing the Lord.

"I would have to say that he is a rare breed," Williams said. "He's not your average young adult. Not only is he a man of God, but he is trying to live what he believes in and that's hard to find in a man or female these days — someone who is speaking to what he believes and just being bold enough to not follow the crowd. He comes at you with love and compassion."

The love and compassion surrounding Watkins will continue to drive him to succeed as a messenger of God. In his message, Watkins encourages individuals know Jesus the way that he has come to know him.

"Christ is big enough to take away your struggles," Watkins said. "I thought about all the things I'd have to give up but in the end, you just give Christ a chance to triumph. Just really get to know Jesus and give him a chance. Get to know him and I promise that he will not let you down. Just let him change your life."

Local runaway found in Alabama

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 15-year-old Manhattan girl reported missing by her mother on Jan. 28 was found Friday, according to Riley County Police Department reports.

RCPD Capt. Tim Hegarty said Shirley Stockton was found in Tuscaloosa, Ala., with family friend Prince Knight, 37. She is physically fine and has been returned to her family, Hegarty said.

According to an RCPD press release, Stockton voluntarily left the Manhattan area with Knight. Stockton was en route to Lemoore, Calif., where her father lives, Hegarty said.

Hegarty said there is no indication Stockton was held against her will at any time, but there is indication she was misled by Knight. There is reason to doubt Knight was going to follow through with helping Stockton get to California, he said.

According to the RCPD press release, Knight was arrested on a Riley County warrant for aggravated interference with parental custody and felony contributing to a child's misconduct. His bond was set at $50,000.

Additional charges are likely, Hegarty said.

Speaker asks for global response to HIV/AIDS

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The face of AIDS has changed — from the disease of wealthy, homosexual American men to the disease of South African women who experience discrimination, poverty and a lack of education.

Elizabeth Lule, manager of the AIDS Campaign Team for Africa at the World Bank, addressed the issues involving the changing face of the HIV/AIDS epidemic in Africa on Monday in the K-State Student Union as a part of the Donald J. Adamchak Distinguished Lecture Series in Sociology and Social Work. Lule also discussed new data and the results of several studies regarding the HIV/AIDS epidemic.

Before joining the team at the World Bank, Lule said she worked in Nigeria. Originally from Uganda, Lule gained experience in policy and health reforms, conducted analytical work and worked with USAID and the Nigerian Ministry of Health, where she found the virus is not prejudiced against race, gender or sexual preferences.

During her introduction, Lule said AIDS has killed more people than the plague, and this issue should be considered a global problem and major social- and economic-development challenge.

Though she mostly focused on HIV/AIDS development in Africa, she also explained why it is a global issue.

She emphasized that many people think HIV/AIDS is only an African problem, but in reality, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

Popular weight-loss pill offers results, side effects

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a world consumed by discovering the latest, greatest product, the weight-loss market is no exception to the trend.

Alli is the newest product claiming to be a weight-loss sensation. As the only Food and Drug Administration approved, over-the-counter weight-loss product, Alli has nutritionists across the country and the K-State campus talking.

According to www.mylalli.com, the pill promises to be a "pill with a plan" that requires an individual's commitment to a new way of life.

"The thing with Alli, the manufacturers will tell you that if it's used in conjunction with a weight-loss diet and regular exercise, Alli claims to increase weight loss by 50 percent rather than just diet alone," said Tandra Kidd, assistant professor of human nutrition.

If a dieter is able to lose 10 pounds with diet and exercise alone, taking Alli will result in the loss of an extra 50 percent, or 5 pounds, bringing the total weight loss to 15 pounds.

Kathy Grunewald, professor of human nutrition, said Alli is a reduced formula version of Orlistat, which used to be a prescription weight-loss drug.

Alli works by absorbing a quarter of the fat consumed. The active ingredient, Orlistat, attaches to some of the natural enzymes in the digestive system and prevents the break down of a quarter of the fat eaten. Undigested fat is unable to be absorbed and proceeds to pass through the body naturally. Alli claims that this excess fat is not harmful.

"Alli works in the digestive system by blocking the absorption of fat, thereby decreasing the number of calories that are absorbed," Kidd said. "The problem is that due to its fat-blocking ability; persons taking this product may experience some side-effects such as gas with oily spotting or more frequent stools that may be hard to control."

Kidd said Alli also might contribute a decrease in the amount of fat nutrients absorbed causing an increased risk of infection, impaired night vision, muscle weakness, anemia, weak bones and bruising. Manufacturers recommend that people using Alli also take a multi-vitamin to lessen these effects.

The Alli plan works by prohibiting the amount of fat that a person consumes. Alli's Web site recommends about 1,600 calories each day and no more than 30 percent of those from fat each day.

"It really works as a negative consequence. If somebody eats a really high-fat meal and they're taking Alli, then they have diarrhea-type symptoms after they eat that meal," said Staci Hendrickson, certified dietician and personal trainer. "People I've worked with who take it say it really helps them stay away from high-fat foods and fast foods because they don't like the consequences when they eat it."

Consequences listed on the Alli Web site include gas with oily spotting, loose stools and more frequent stools that are hard to control. The site also suggested that when beginning the program, individuals choose a time in which they do not need to leave the house. If someone chooses to leave the house, they are advised to wear dark pants and carry an extra pair in case of uncontrollable bowel movements.

"With Alli, if you want to decrease the side effects, the manufacturers recommend you consume no more than 15 grams of fat with each meal. The more fat that needs to be blocked, the more side effects," Kidd said.

Though the manufacturers intended the product for those 18 years and older, only those who are 21 and older can purchase

Alli. The 90-count starter pack costs about $60 and includes reference guides about the product and how to follow a healthy diet and exercise.

"I usually don't recommend Alli, but if people want to take it and give it a try, then I'll help them work with it," Hendrickson said.

Once a patient begins taking Alli, the most significant results will occur within the first six months, according to the Web site. After that, however, the site recommends that the users continue with the pills indefinitely, or the weight might return.

Consult your physician before taking any weight-loss supplement.

Chinese ambassador stresses peaceful relations with U.S., others

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Chinese Ambassador to the United States emphasized the importance of peace in developing a stronger Chinese-U.S. relationship, using the word peace several times in his lecture Monday in McCain Auditorium.

"We are ready to join hands with people across the world to promote the building of a harmonious world of enduring peace and common prosperity," said Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong during the 150th lecture in the Landon Lecture Series.

After thanking the crowd for its interest in learning more about China, Zhou continuously stressed building a harmonious relationship between the U.S. and the rapidly growing China. Zhou said China has resolved to eliminate war and any acts that would harm peace and prosperity in China.

Zhou acknowledged, though, that China still is a developing country.

"We are the most populous country in the world," he said. "Our economic foundation is weak, and our development is unbalanced."

Zhou said China will concentrate on developing its technology and improving the standard of living for the Chinese people. He also said China will concentrate on developing trade and encouraging peaceful relations throughout the world.

"China does not seek hegemony ... nor does it challenge the territory, integrity or sovereignty of other countries," he said. "China is a responsible country, and it is committed to upholding peace and stability in the world and its own region."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

H.E. Zhou Wenzhong, Chinese Ambassador, spoke to an audience in McCain Auditorium during the 150th Landon Lecture. The speech focused on the relationship between China and the U.S., and also the current state of China.

Zhou said the China-U.S. relationship affects the whole world, not just the two countries involved. He said China and the U.S. need to work together on several issues that affect the whole world like terrorism, nuclear proliferation, climate change, disease control and disaster relief.

"China and the United States have moral converging interests in the broad areas of cooperation," he said. "Our two countries have effective communication and coordination on the ... Iranian nuclear issue, Darfur, Myanmar, Pakistan, the Middle East and other international and regional issues."

Zhou ended his speech by addressing what he said was one of the most pressing dangers to peace in China — Taiwan's interest in forming an independent country.

Taiwan is part of the Republic of China, but has made several moves toward independence recently. Zhou said he feared these moves could possibly turn violent and called the situation "delicate and grave."

"We will never allow anyone to separate Taiwan from the motherland in any way or by any means," he said.

Zhou also said he hoped the U.S. will keep its promise to promote Taiwan's remaining a peaceful part of the Republic of China.

Leku Wang, freshman

in finance, said Zhou's message about Taiwan was important. Landon Lecture Series Chairman Charles Reagan also spoke of the importance of Taiwanese-Chinese relations.

"That's a very sore point with Chinese people," Reagan said.

Wang, a native of China, said he attended the lecture because it was important to

Governor's budget proposal top issue during 2008 legislative session

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State president Jon Weis will testify before the Kansas House Appropriations Committee Wednesday about K-State's financial needs and the governor's budget recommendations for fiscal year 2009.

Kansas House Appropriations Committee members were presented with budget guidelines Thursday. House Appropriations Committee and its budget subcommittee must follow the guidelines this legislative session while considering Gov. Kathleen Sebelius's fiscal year 2009 budget proposal, said Sue Peterson, K-State director of governmental relations and assistant to the president.

Peterson said House committee members want to keep the budget at a 5 percent or less increase from fiscal year 2008. While legislators have implied the guidelines in the past, the written guidelines for the increase considerations are new to this legislative session, Peterson said.

"From our perspective, we're just keeping an eye on them, but it has a long way to go from a budget perspective," Peterson said. "It's by no means the end. We'll be watching, and we'll be making our case."

In her fiscal year 2009 proposal, Sebelius recommended a $35 million opportunity grant increase for all Kansas post-secondary education institutions, which is a 4.4 percent increase from fiscal year 2008. She also recommended an additional $15 million to address deferred maintenance at Regents universities and a $4.5 million increase in student financial aid.

Peterson said the proposed increase will help fund Regents universities' operating fees and faculty members' salaries. If the proposed budget passes, the funds will be allocated to the Regents for their distribution to individual universities, Peterson said.

The Kansas Board of Regents submitted its fiscal year 2009 budget proposal to Sebelius in September. Sebelius made her budget recommendations at her 2008 State of the State Address on Jan. 14.

Kansas legislators will make their budget recommendation by May 1, Peterson said.

The 2008 legislative session started Jan. 14, and the session cannot constitutionally exceed 90 days unless both the Kansas House and Senate each vote two-thirds to extend the session.

Twenty-two percent of K-State's overall budget comes from the state legislature, Peterson said. K-State's funding primarily comes from state appropriations and tuition, Peterson said. To calculate the university's budget, Peterson said university administration incorporates the State General Fund and potential tuition-rate increases.

"A lot of factors will go in the tuition rate, but a real key is that initial support from the state from the governor's budget recommendation and what the legislative supports," Peterson said.

Other educational issues during the 2008 Kansas legislative session will include the connection between higher education and kindergarten through 12th grade, and qualified admissions, Peterson said.

Peterson said she recommends students make personal connections with their home-

"That relationship between the student and the legislator that represents them is really important," Peterson said. "They don't have to have a formal program to do that."

STUDENT LEGISLATIVE INVOLVEMENT

dents also have opportunities to make their voices heard throughout the legislative session.

K-State Student Governing Association members, along with the College of Agriculture, will visit legislators and their staff members today at the Capitol. The annual event is an opportunity for students to visit with legislators about K-State and its issues, said Daryn Soldan, Student Senate Governmental Relations Committee chairman.

K-State student representatives also will collaborate with other Regents universities Wednesday at State Higher Education Day. Soldan, master's student in landscape architecture, said groups of two or three students will meet during the day with legislators.

While deferred maintenance served as a main talking point for last year's Higher Education Day, Soldan said students will take a more general approach with university issues and stress the importance of higher education.

"From what I've seen in the past, education does take a very high priority, but even with education, people are coming from it at different points," Soldan said. "It's important to tell our perspective."

SGA members have worked this year to include more K-State students and organizations in political events and issues, Soldan said.

"We really targeted this year in getting the word out not only to SGA but to the student population in general," he said. "It's a goal to work through the outlets we have. We'd like to spread it a little bit more."

Moran visits campus, talks with students

Rep. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., stopped Monday afternoon at the K-State Student Union to talk with students in the food court. George Weston, graduate student in sociology and president of the College Republicans, said Moran wanted a relaxed atmosphere in which he could speak more personally with students.

Deadline for password change today

By Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wednesday is the deadline for students to change their eID passwords.

Password changes provide the best protection for students computing identity, files and K-

State resources. Students, faculty, and staff must change passwords for their eIDs twice a year through their eProfile page (via the eid.k-state.edu site).

This policy took effect in summer 1999 as a result of increasing break-ins on K-State computers and the need to enhance computer security.

If students don't change their eID's password by the deadline, it expires for security purposes. Students will not be able to access their central e-mail, log on to KATS, and more. For more information, go to the eid Web site.

Up in smoke

Colleges should accept money donated by Big Tobacco

If you were a university professor and a company was willing to donate thousands of dollars toward your research, would you accept the donation?

Many would probably say yes. Few institutions can count solely on money generated by students' tuition and state and federal grants to finance studies. Researchers are forced to look for funding outside the public sector to continue their academic work.

But what if the contributing business was a tobacco company?

The McCombs School of Business at the University of Texas was recently faced with just such an issue. In a Feb. 4 article in the New York Times, dean of the business school George Gau said the decision was an easy one. Gau's school decided two months ago to refuse all tobacco money — not just for research but student activities and conferences.

"What it came down to for us was the ethical dimension," he said. "The leadership of the school felt that in some sense it was tainted money, that it is money gotten from a product that is significantly harming people."

For some in higher education, the dangerous products peddled by tobacco companies are enough to justify the refusal of money. Others point to the infamous history the industry has of muddying the research that proved the health risk of their products.

Not every school has shut out Big Tobacco's money. Last September, the California Board of Regents rejected a proposal that would ban tobacco money for research. Instead, chancellors on each of the regents' campuses will have the autonomy to decide.

Accepting money from tobacco companies does not mean a university endorses smoking. The issue at stake is not tobacco but academic freedom. For this reason, the California plan makes sense; the decision to accept tobacco money should come from the bottom up, starting with scientists, professors, researchers, faculties and departments, not top down, like from the regents or central administration.

Medical and public-health schools are more likely to completely ban tobacco money, removing their faculty members' power to make an individual choice. According to the Times article, Emory University medical school already has banned tobacco money, along with public-health schools at Ohio State, Louisiana State, Harvard, Johns Hopkins, and the universities of Iowa, Arizona and North Carolina.

Though a gap exists between what such schools teach and what the tobacco companies promote, researchers still deserve the authority to reach their own verdict. When a school makes the decision for its faculty, an important academic right is denied.

Rob Denell, professor of biology, said though a university has the power and responsibility of oversight, wholesale bans on the source of funding for research should be rare.

"A faculty member's ability to choose a research area and to achieve funding for it is an important aspect of academic freedom," he said. "Many of the awards derived from tobacco companies support research that has nothing to do with tobacco and its impact on human health."

Denell is the director for the Terry C. Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research, an on-campus entity with 60 affiliated faculty members. The center takes a hands-off approach in determining what sources of funding should be pursued by its researchers.

"In general, the individual faculty members apply for grants in ways in which the center has no role whatsoever," Denell said.

This freedom is an academic right. If steps are to be taken to refuse funding from controversial sources, researchers should work together, build consensus and form policy that makes sense for their department or institution. If the question of accepting money from tobacco companies is an ethical one, let researchers decide independently, based on their own ethics.

The purpose of higher education is to train future citizens and pursue knowledge in an impartial environment. Accepting tobacco money for research does not endanger that mission. Refusing research contributions would do little but deny schools a viable source of funding. The controversial nature of a corporation should not preclude its donations from being used for research on campuses.

TO THE POINT

Students should be educated on HIV/AIDS virus

HIV/AIDS can happen right here, right now. It is no longer just a problem in Africa or with homosexuals; it is a global issue that includes the U.S. and Midwest.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Elizabeth Lule, manager of the AIDS Campaign Team for Africa at the World Bank, gave a lecture on the changing face of the HIV/AIDS epidemic in Africa on Monday in the K-State Student Union as a part of the Donald J. Adamchak Distinguished Lecture Series in Sociology and Social Work.

HIV/AIDS is a virus that knows no one specific country, gender, sexual preference, age or race, Lule said. HIV/AIDS is an issue that needs to be addressed, with concern for our national safety. Especially since it can affect anyone, regardless if you're black or white, male or female, or even gay or straight.

Responsibility is the only way we can avoid giving this deadly virus the upper-hand in the battle for our health and standard-of-living.

There are simple steps to protecting yourself against the virus. If you are sexually active, getting tested at least once a year and using protection like a condom can help you remain virus-free. And while these precautions cannot guarantee you will never contract HIV/AIDS, they certainly can lower your chances.

Also, it is important to be educated on the causes and effects of the virus. Americans need to take a stand and prevent this disease from spreading and create awareness that this disease is a serious issue.

Voters should beware of candidates' persuasive speech tactics

"We love you, Barack," yelled one of Sen. Barack Obama's supporters during a speech he gave in Chicago as votes continued to pour in from the Super Tuesday primary elections.

"You know I love you back," Obama said, according to an article in the New York Times, and laughter erupted from the audience.

"But there is one thing on this February night that we do not need the final results to know," he continued. "Our time has come. Our movement is real. And change is coming to America."

How could his supporters not love him when he uses words like that? There's no question about it: Obama is a gifted orator.

He has a real knack for leading people to believe in him and his ideas about change. Then again, he's not exactly alone in that arena. After all, many politicians — including some of his rival candidates — are talented speakers. With so much at stake this election season, we can be sure the candidates will employ all the verbal prowess they've got to win their voters' hearts. For this reason, we need to be exceptionally wary when listening to them speak.

Generally speaking, the candidates are going to tell us what we want to hear. For example, if people are worried about the sluggish economy, the candidates will tell us they have a plan to fix it. Do these presidential hopefuls truly plan on keeping their campaign promises? Well, that's not really for me to say.

The idealist in me wants to believe they will, but my realistic instincts keep reminding me the candidates could be making empty or half-baked promises just to grab a few more votes.

The issues aside, there's still the matter of the candidates' actual performance as speakers. Remarkably gifted speakers can acquire votes and support even if their platform is weak. Let me make a brief illustration.

Imagine a gangly looking economic analyst, incredibly intelligent but hopelessly introverted, presenting his plan to save Social Security to the K-State student section at Bramlage Coliseum. Now picture an experienced, charismatic Southern Baptist preacher giving them essentially the same plan — with a few "amens" added in, of course. Who do you think the crowd would really listen to? Well, that's no contest. Clearly, being easy to listen to counts for more than just spare change.

So, do you think you're above been duped by verbal smoke and mirrors? Before saying yes, consider the research of Christian Grose, a political scientist at Vanderbilt University. Grose conducted a study that suggests college students might not be as invulnerable to a good speech as they would think.

"It's reasonable to assume that highly educated voters would be less likely to have the wool pulled over their eyes' by rhetoric," Grose said in a story published by Scripps Higher Education News Service on Jan. 25.

However, the study's results show that voters with high levels of education are actually more susceptible to eloquent speech than voters with less education.

"Voters with lower levels of education will not be moved as much to vote for candidates with complex speaking patterns," Grose said. "They prefer candidates who, in a sense, speak their language."

Ultimately, choosing which candidate to support is a personal-judgment call. Speaking as an idealist again, I'm sure all of the candidates would make fine presidents, even if they only got the job by outclassing their opponents on the verbal battlefield. Besides, after winning through eight years of "Bush-isms," having an articulate president would be a nice change of scenery. Even so, when you're at the polls this November, think carefully before casting your vote. Don't let a smooth-talker make your decision for you.

Suicide scare prompts Texas students to bike to Alaska

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kyle Ferguson and several friends reached out to Waco, Texas, psychologists and Facebook.com after a friend told them he had tried to commit suicide the night before.

Four months later, a Facebook group has expanded into a nonprofit organization and future cross-country bike trip.

Ferguson, a Baylor University junior in international studies, co-created the Facebook group "Four guys, one destination, one mission: Suicide Prevention" on Nov. 4, 2007. Ferguson said he and several friends pledged to bike from Texas to Alaska for nationwide suicide awareness when the group reached 250,000 members.

"We figured that if we're going to do this, we need to have some backing and we needed to have somebody to keep us accountable," Ferguson said.

Ferguson said he thought it would take at least one year for the target group total. Twelve days later, 250,000 people had joined, and the group retains more than 298,000 people as of Monday.

"We were taken aback quite a bit," Ferguson said. "Initially, we freaked out a little. But we came together the night it reached 250,000, and we realized that when we set out to do this we were determined. None of us has lost our determination yet."

Ferguson and other group members collaborated with Waco, Texas, psychologists and with the Baylor University Counseling Center. They also registered with the state of Texas as a nonprofit organization called the Alive Campaign, and they also are registering with the IRS so people can claim their monetary contributions.

On May 15, Baylor students Andi Kaka-sone, Nathan Lloyd, Justin Brown, Steve Zimmerman and Ferguson will leave Texas for Alaska on bicycles. Ferguson said the trip is about 4,500 miles, and group members estimate the trip will take between 60-80 days. Group members have raised about $5,000 and they aim to raise about $20,000 total before the trip, Ferguson said.

"It's something that, unlike alcohol and drugs, isn't really talked about much among the youth," Ferguson said. "By doing this bike trip, we're hoping to gain media attention. By gaining media attention, then we'll get out there and talk about suicide and depression."

More than 32,000 people died by suicide in the U.S. in 2005, which is the latest available date for the data, according to the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention. Suicide is the third leading cause of death among those 15 to 24 years old, according to the foundation.

While the Internet has provided helpful information and resources about suicide prevention and awareness, few factual checkpoints exist and misinformation is likely, said Kristin Kahler, licensed psychologist with K-State's University Counseling Services. Networking sites like Facebook let people know they aren't alone and isolated with their depressive symptoms, Kahler said.

"Four guys, one destination, one mission" provides a discussion board that allows personal posts about peoples' experiences with suicide, either personally or with friends and loved ones. Ferguson said he and the group's administrators each monitor the discussion board at least twice a day for potentially harmful messages.

"I think intense discussions do more good than harm because these people realize they aren't alone," Ferguson said. "It's good to talk about it, but we suggest that everyone seek professional help somehow through a hotline, talking with a psychiatrist, family member or a trusted person."

However, peoples' expectations with Facebook message-board discussions differ and some people might think the response is instantaneous and from a licensed professional, Kahler said.

"If someone's really on the verge of hurting themselves, twice a day [monitoring] isn't going to cut it," she said.

Family members and friends also have posted more than 500 pictures of loved ones who died by suicide at "Four guys, one destination, one mission." Kahler said potential positive and negative aspects exist with the picture postings.

"It might be cathartic and grieving to post a picture of a loved one," she said. "At the same time, it's out there on the Internet and someone can take that photo and that information and do with it whatever they want."

MUSIC REVIEW

Headier hip-hop offers more substantial lyrics, complicated beats

"None Shall Pass"

Review by Mark Sibilla

Atypical to my routine and against my better judgment, I have been listening to the radio. I love a brainless club thumper as much as the next person, but after a while, listening to popular hip-hop becomes tedious. I need something with more substance.

Thank the hip-hop gods for the Definitive Jux (Def Jux) label. The New York-based label is responsible for two releases by seminal artists this past year that have helped satiate my need for headier hip-hop. Label founder, rapper and producer, El-P released the excellent "I'll Sleep When You're Dead," and the prolific rapper/producer Aesop Rock released "None Shall Pass," his best record since his 2001 album "Labor Days."

Produced almost entirely by Aesop and his good friend

Blockhead, "None Shall Pass" is a slightly more accessible version of the wordy flow and complicated beats for which Aesop is known. In addition to the amazing beats, DJ Big Wiz provides meticulously placed turntable scratches to help give the entire record a more lively feel.

"Keep off the Lawn" is the perfect opener; with its grand cymbal washes and electric guitar squall, it seems like you are at the club as the band warms up, just waiting for the emcee to take the stage and blow you away with his dope rhymes. At about the one-minute mark, the beat drops in, and Aesop casually strolls in confidently with his craggly monotone, spitting mouthfuls of metaphorical narratives.

The title track is a showstopper. With its four-on-the-floor beat, bouncy synthesizer line and gripping hook, it is one of the most immediate songs in Aesop's catalog. The song also contains one of Aesop's most lithe performances on record as his flow bounces along with the beat rather than cramming infinite syllables into a line at the expense of the beat, which was a problem that plagued Aesop's last album, 2003's "Bazooka Tooth."

Most of Aesop's lyrics are rather cryptic, and this can be alienating to many upon the first listen. Meaning isn't discerned from individual lines, but rather repeated listens are rewarded as combinations of metaphors cause meanings to emerge from the fog of words constantly flowing from Aesop's tongue.

Some of the tracks have rather benign or silly narratives. For example, "Bring Back Pluto" is a song about how the eight larger planets bullied Pluto from the solar system, while "The Harbor Is Yours" is a rather creatively produced shanty about pirates, mutiny and mermaids.

Others take on a more serious tone. "Fumes" is a rather complex tale of a drug-fueled couple and their spiral into oblivion. "39 Thieves" features excellent production by Aesop, which consists of crime noir-like horns and an outstanding guest spot by El-P. It is easy to determine the message when El-P flatly states, "Money is cool, I'm only human/But they use it as a tool to make the workers feel excluded/Like the shinier the jewel the more exclusive the troop is/Bullets don't take bribes, stupid, they shoot shit."

But even when tracks don't have a recognizable story or message, it is still exciting to hear Aesop's complex internal rhyme and innovative phrasing. I have no idea what "OK, woke to a grocery list/Goes like this: duty and death/Anyone object, come stand in the way/You can be my little Snake River Canyon today/And I ran with a chain of commands/And a jetpack strap where the backstab lands if it can," means, but it sounds cool coming out of Aesop's mouth.

Though it might take a couple of listens to get used to Aesop's distinct writing and rhyming, "None Shall Pass" is a very satisfying listen. At 15 tracks and just over an hour of music, Aesop's verbose manifestos and dense productions can become tiring by album's end, but ultimately, each track is an important piece in the album's overall flow and effect. "None Shall Pass" is an excellent look into underground hip-hop and the perfect alternative to the mindless fluff blaring from the radio parading itself as hip-hop.

Inside intramurals

New winter sports provide students with fresh indoor options

By Joe Bergkamp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The coveted K-State intramural champion T-shirts are once again on the line this semester, as the spring sessions of intramural sports have begun.

Traditionally, basketball is one of the most popular sports offered by intramural services. In the five divisions offered – fraternity, independent, residence hall, women's and co-recreational – there are more than 250 teams signed up for competition.

To add even more spirit to the competition, talks are underway to televise the intramural basketball championships on Cox Cable Channel 8. Nothing has been confirmed yet, but with the volleyball championships being well-received during the fall semester on the same channel, Marian Brandenburg, an administrative specialist for the Peters Recreation Complex, said they hope to make this happen again.

Paul Titterington, senior in management and non-profit leadership and member of the independent basketball league team Stomp the Yard, said he's excited about the possibility of being able to play on TV.

"It would be awesome to get the opportunity to do something like that my senior year, even if it was just on local cable," Titterington said. "I think it would be cool if [intramural services] could hook something up to have the K-State champs play against the KU champs. I know other schools do that kind of thing with their rivals. That would really add to the competition."

Basketball might be the most popular activity sponsored by the K-State Recreational Services, but some of the other individual sports like doubles table tennis, doubles racquetball and even wallyball have full brackets. Max Thomas, junior in economics, was one of about 80 K-State teams in the doubles table-tennis bracket.

"It's a great chance to go out and play a sport that is usually hard to find other competitors," Thomas said. "Table tennis is one of those sports more about the sanctity of the game as opposed to the direct competition you find in sports like basketball."

New to the intramural slate this year are indoor soccer and a disc-golf tournament. These two events were created to fill the void after recreational services decided to end the intramural track meet. Disc golfers and ultimate frisbee athletes pushed to add the disc-golf tournament to the intramural activities list.

"Many of the same students that played ultimate frisbee in the fall asked for us to set something up at Tuttle Creek State Park, as they have a very nice course design there," Brandenburg said.

The indoor soccer tournament was also created from high K-State student participation. The one-day tournament will take place on April 5, and entries will be accepted from March 31 to April 3. The disc golf tournament will take place April 26 with entries accepted from April 21-24.

Another semester of intramural activities will wrap up in May with 23 new champions in either team or individual sports. For students involved in spring intramurals, the next several months will be full of games and matches. But for those aiming to earn a much-coveted intramural champion T-shirt, it might be well-worth the effort.

Players provide laughs, humor off the court

In case you haven't noticed, the K-State men's basketball team has some comedians.

It all started when freshman forward Michael Beasley made his famous statement about the KU match-ups, personally scheduling a third game in the series in Africa.

Then, K-State coach Frank Martin started letting Beasley and freshman guard Jacob Pullen speak to the media. Throw in the antics of junior forward Andre Gilbert and hilarity ensues.

Recently, Beasley and Pullen took a page from Will Ferrell's movie "Talladega Nights" and did the shake-and-bake gesture to the reporters.

For nearly every question they are asked, there seems to be a way the players can garner some laughs out of anyone nearby. What the fans do see during the games from videos on the Bramlage Coliseum scoreboard only tells half the story. It's the behind-the-scenes material that is the most entertaining.

Take for example the shot senior guard Clint Stewart nearly made against Texas A&M, when he simply threw the ball behind his back while going out-of-bounds.

After the game, Stewart said he had practiced the shot and made it during practice, so he was disappointed when he missed it. And that might be the lighter side of the joking that goes on during interviews.

However, the players seem to know when to joke and when to get to business. The Wildcats have grown into a mature team this season, playing with the teamwork of a group that has been together for several years.

The most recent string of comedy from the players has been a series of videos posted by the Royal Purple Yearbook on www.YouTube.com. The videos – one of which is labeled "Mike and the iPod" – feature Beasley messing with an iPod that is being used as a press recorder.

Beasley and Pullen can be seen messing with the recorder and whispering messages that can only be picked up by the recorders on the table. This means even after the press conference there are some messages left by the players.

Though the "Funny or Die" comedy tour already has come and gone from Manhattan, Beasley and Pullen could have been great additions to the section in which Ron Burgundy interviewed football coach Ron Prince. I can only imagine the laughs which would have resulted.

From what I have seen this year, I think Beasley's love of SpongeBob SquarePants might land him a guest spot on the show. After all, if David Hasselhoff can appear, Beasley would almost surely be just as funny.

Which player is the most entertaining? I can't say just yet – because there are still a few games left for the Wildcats to create some laughs.

No. 33 Wichita State to visit for re-match against Wildcats

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a 7-0 victory over the Saint Louis Billikens Saturday, the K-State women's tennis team must prepare for a big rematch against in-state rival No. 32 Wichita State.

Memories of a 1-6 loss to the Shockers last season still linger for the Wildcats and serve as extra motivation to come out victorious this time.

"That was a stunner for our team last year," coach Steve Bietau said. "I think it was more for our players than our coaches, because we knew ahead of time more than our players how good Wichita State was last year. They proved through the rest of the season that they were definitely a good team. So, for a long time it had always been us coming out on top against them, and now it's us with a little something to prove."

Last season, the Wildcats had just come off of a big victory over Drake before they challenged the Shockers. The 1-6 loss snapped a 10-game winning streak over the Shockers, and the Wildcats were thoroughly dominated. The then-No. 54 Wildcats were only able to muster a singles win on their way to the loss. Senior Olga Klimova and junior Katerina Kudlackova, K-State's most successful doubles team last season, were silenced 8-0. In the No. 2 doubles spot, seniors Fernanda Da Valle and Viviana Yrureta, were shut down, losing 8-3.

Former K-State football player named Miami athletic director

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CORAL GABLES, Fla. – Kirby Hocutt has been hired as the University of Miami's athletic director. He'd been the AD at Ohio University since 2005.

The former Kansas State linebacker also spent six years in Oklahoma's athletic department, where he helped oversee a major fundraising campaign.

Hocutt replaces Paul Dee, who announced plans to resign in May after serving as the Hurricanes' AD since 1993 and is expected to join the school's faculty on June 1st. Dee's tenure at the school was highlighted by the Hurricanes' 2001 national football championship, two national titles in baseball and the construction of Miami's $48 million dollar campus basketball arena.

K-State's Franklin recognized for community work

James Franklin is doing good work off the court in addition to his duties on the court.

The senior guard was named to the Big 12 Conference's Good Works team for the winter sports season. The team, which is comprised of student-athletes who participate in basketball, gymnastics, swimming and diving and wrestling, recognizes individuals who have contributed to the community.

Franklin was the second Wildcat in a row to be named to the team. Senior guard Clint Stewart was named to the team last season. Franklin saw a career-high 11 minutes of play during the contest Feb. 9 against Oklahoma State.

Beasley breaks Big-12 record with third award

Michael Beasley is now in the Big 12 Conference record books.

The freshman forward was named Big 12 Rookie of the Week for the third consecutive week, the first time this feat has been accomplished in the 12-year history of the conference.

The only player in Big 12 history who has achieved more Rookie of the Week accolades was stand-out Texas freshman Kevin Durant last year.

Beasley currently ranks first in the nation in rebounds per game, averaging 12.3 boards per game. He is also averaging 25.2 points per game, which is first in the conference and fourth overall in the nation.

Bush to increase funding for biosecurity facility

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The White House wants to pump up national security – and K-State might reap the benefits.

President Bush made a commitment to increase funding for the $450 million National Bio and Agro-Defense Facility, for which K-State is in contention. Bush said he plans to increase facility funding by $35.6 million for the fiscal year 2009.

K-State is one of six sites being considered for the defense facility. University officials remain hopeful that Manhattan will make the final cut because of its rich history in protecting the nation's food supply, said President Jon Wefald.

"In March 1999 – years before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, – K-State launched the Homeland Defense Food Safety, Security and Emergency Preparedness Program, which was aimed at solving pressing food animal and food safety problems, while preparing to meet emerging threats," Wefald said in a release. "In October 1999, I testified before the U.S. Senate's Emerging Threats Subcommittee on the agricultural biological weapons threat."

Since 1999, Wefald, along with other legislators, has contended to run the facility that will protect America, right here in the heartland.

"At K-State, we have dedicated significant resources to agrosecurity, including establishing the National Agricultural Biosecurity Center and the Biosecurity Research Institute, representing the latest in collaborative research capabilities," Wefald said.

"This strategy of preparedness – with NBAF as a vital piece – is our nation's best chance at preventing and fending off a potential attack on our food supply. K-State stands behind this commitment and we are hopeful that Congress will also support this critical cornerstone of our national security."

Last month, the Kansas Bioscience Authority announced a campaign to start a $2.5 million research initiative at K-State's Biosecurity Research Institute. According to the KBA, the plan would strengthen the university's research capabilities in addressing animal health and threats to the nation's food supply.

The $2.5 million plan – known as the Collaborative Bioscience Research Initiative – will allow researchers from the government, non-profit organizations and other universities to conduct research and collaborate with K-State, according to the KBA.

"We're issuing a call today for the nation's brightest researchers to partner with us to protect public health and safeguard the agriculture economy," said KBA President Tom Thornton at last month's Kansas Bioscience Day at the Capitol. "Our facilities are highly specialized and world-class, and our scientists are doing world-class research. Now is the time for collaboration to take on this important national challenge."

Though Kansas has made significant steps to solidify K-State's Biosecurity Research Institute, Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., released a statement that said Bush's $35.6 million increase is a serious step toward founding the NBAF facility.

"This marks another major step forward for the NBAF facility and shows the importance given to this lab to protect our country's national security," Roberts said. "I'm going to work with my colleagues to make sure this investment remains intact so that vital animal-health research is enhanced for the continued safety of the American people."

K-State is among six finalists for the $450 million federal biosecurity facility. The finalists include sites in Georgia, Mississippi, New York, North Carolina and Texas. The Department of Homeland Security will make its final decision in October, and construction would be completed in 2013.

CITY COMMISSION

Redevelopment project tops Commission's agenda

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City Commission will vote tonight on allowing Mayor Tom Phillips and City Clerk Gary Fees to enter into a purchase agreement with Dial Reality and a lease agreement with O'Reilly's Auto Parts.

Now, O'Reilly's Automotive resides within the south redevelopment project site.

"The lease agreement allows [O'Reilly's] to stay [at 324 Fort Riley Blvd.] as long as feasible," Commissioner Bruce Snead said.

Within the south end redevelopment plan, the city obtained four pieces of the property by the use of eminent domain.

"Eminent domain is the concept or principal that the government or city can acquire property from private owners for public use," Snead said.

Snead said the acquisition of property by the use of eminent domain for economic development by cities within the state of Kansas could no longer be utilized as of July 1, 2007.

The state legislature passed the law two years ago, causing the city to move quickly in purchasing or acquiring all the property necessary for the north and south end redevelopment projects.

The commission will be receiving updates on the status on the south end project tonight.

During the work session, commissioners also will hear project updates on the intersection proposition of Fort Riley Boulevard and Davis Drive, Snead said.

The Social Services Advisory Board will give its annual report and update on Social Services activities within the city.

Snead said Social Services receive about $300,000 a year in funds from the city for services like child care and transportation.

Foreclosures affect entire market

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Housing foreclosures affect the entire market, not just one particular income bracket.

Charles Rich, owner of Little Apple Real Estate, said foreclosures have occurred on houses ranging from $15,000 to $400,000.

"It's been slow since June," Rich said. "There's not many buyers out there. Some [houses] have sold for significantly less. It is definitely a buyer's market. There is an over-stock of houses, low interest rates and a low number of buyers. If you are in the right position, it's great."

The problem is most consumers are not able to afford a mortgage right now. Rich said the stimulus package supported by President Bush and members of Congress will not stimulate the housing market because the kickback isn't going to be big enough to allow people to buy homes.

To alleviate the pinch in his pocketbook from the market slow-down, Rich has begun trading in the Real Estate Owned housing market.

REO properties are houses that have been repossessed by the bank because of owners foreclosing on their mortgages. Rich said the houses he has managed in Manhattan had mortgages acquired outside the community. Working in the REO market has helped increase his listings, but he also has helped others save their homes from foreclosure.

"It doesn't pay much, but it makes you feel good helping [home owners] save their homes," Rich said.

He maintains the houses he cannot save by checking the property, mowing the lawn and performing general maintenance until the redemption period has expired. Then, the lending institutions put the houses on the market for resale.

"The rental market is pretty minimal, too," Rich said.

Rich said two years ago, there was an average of 250 to 300 houses available for rent in Manhattan. Last year, at one point there were 580 houses available for rent, and as of now there are 430 houses vacant.

Scott Munsen, branch manager of The Mortgage Company in Manhattan, said the market has been negatively affected by the media coverage of the housing foreclosures in other areas of the country.

"I've been originating mortgages for 11 years," Munsen said. "I've never seen it quite like this. Every time people would turn on the TV there was something negative about the housing on it."

Even with the negativity broadcast by the media, Munsen said the market is still strong in Manhattan.

"I think [the slow down in Manhattan's housing market] is short term," he said. "Manhattan is its own little entity."

Randy Stitt, Vice President of Community First National Bank said he agreed with Munsen.

"Manhattan is buffered more so than other towns because we have a state-funded college," Stitt said. "We are just so lucky for living in this community because we just don't feel the effects of the national economy like other communities."

Stitt said the main reason many people are losing their homes is because of lenders giving money to people who cannot afford the payments.

Manhattan has many knowledgeable and reputable lenders in the area who want their customers to succeed in purchasing a house and not lose it because of over-budgeting, Munsen said.

"We are held to a higher regard," Munsen said. "We do things more ethically than the lenders on the coasts. I'm part of this community and reputation spreads faster in Manhattan than in California and Florida."

According to the Mortgage Bankers Association, 5.59 percent of mortgages were delinquent as of Dec. 6, 2007. Out of the 5.59 percent, 4.72 percent originated as sub-prime loans and only 1.02 percent prime rate loans nationwide.

Munsen said the government is trying to create consumer confidence with lower rates and sees this as a correction in the housing market. He said stricter requirements on lending are good for business.

LECTURE | Chinese students excited to hear ambassador speak Monday

him what the ambassador of his country had to say.

"I am proud of my country and proud of my culture, so that's why I came here," Wang said.

Reagan said many Chinese students reflected the same sentiments.

"They were thrilled to have their ambassador in Kansas," Reagan said. "It's a long way from Washington and an even longer way from China. ... His presence was encouraging to them."

Though Zhou emphasized peace because of the Taiwan issue, Max Lu, associate professor of geography and student faculty adviser of the Chinese Student and Scholar Association, said Zhou also emphasized peace because of Western powers, including the U.S., questioning the motives of China's economic and military growth.

"One reason I can think of is over the past few years several western countries, including the United States, have been saying that China poses a threat to other countries and China is building up its military and flexing its muscles," Lu said.

In an interview after the lecture, Zhou said China could not develop without peaceful and noncombative relations with the U.S. or other countries.

"The problem is when [countries] come and try to grow and compete with the already well-established countries by force - that will not be the case with us," Zhou said.

Reagan estimated that about 1,100 people attended the lecture. At the end of the lecture, K-State President Jon Wefald, asked the all the Chinese students in the crowd to stand up, and about one fifth of the crowd stood up.

Many of these students will get the opportunity to meet the ambassador at a breakfast this morning. The ambassador will visit different places in Kansas during the next few days, including a meeting with Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, Reagan said.

AIDS | Lecture educated listeners on dangers, spread of fatal virus

estimates that about 40,000 people in the United States become infected with HIV annually. For example, in Washington D.C., one in every 50 people suffers from AIDS, and the number of people with HIV is even higher.

Income and gender inequalities, neglected condom use, having several sexual partners at one time, wars and violence and human trafficking were named among major factors that contribute to the spreading of the disease, she said.

Dealing with the epidemic requires global response, Lule said.

"Africa's tomorrow depends on what we do about HIV/AIDS today," she said.

The lecture was also interactive, allowing audience members to ask questions and share their opinions.

Josh Reed, former K-State student who has been an advocate for HIV/AIDS for a long time, said "It is very difficult to be empowered to make a change. Especially here in Kansas - there is a tremendous amount of resistance when you try to do so."

The HIV virus doesn't know any borders, and to better the situation, Lule advised the K-State community to conduct research and raise awareness, promote behavior changes and protect themselves and their loved ones.

The lecture served as a learning tool for students from different areas.

"I got information about it from an e-mail and decided to come because it seems like a very interesting subject matter and an opportunity to learn something new," said Gloria Funcheon, freshman in history.

TENNIS | Women face busy week, matches against 0-1 Shockers

Wildcats came from then-sophomore Maria Perevoshchikova. Kudlackova lost 6-4, 3-6, 7-6(4) to the Shockers' Stephanie Dalmacio. Klimova and Yrureta also were defeated in the No. 1 and No. 6 spots, respectively.

The Wildcats will begin their battle for redemption against the Shockers at 5 p.m. today at Ahearn Field House. The Shockers are 0-1 this season, their loss against No. 5 Georgia on Feb. 1. In that match, the Shockers had difficulty achieving success; the only victory was the doubles team of Dalmacio and Larys-sa Ferreira. The duo topped Cameron Ellis and Adrienne Ellsberry, 8-4, in the No. 3 spot. Ellis and Ellsberry were able to defeat K-State's freshmen Vanessa Cottin and Pauline Guemas during the Georgia Invitational, 8-3.

K-State, fresh off a sweep of Saint Louis, faces a difficult week, with three matches in five days.

Bietau said the approach in practice would be altered because of this.

"We may get some rest during the middle of the week after Wichita State," he said. "I know how they look to me, but sometimes when we talk to them about it, it's not the same. We have some experienced players like Vivi [Yrureta] and Olga who have a real good sense of what their bodies can take. When you have experienced players like that, it's good because you can get feedback from them that will help you make better decisions more than you would from freshmen."

Bietau also said the time to make changes is limited.

"We don't get a lot of practice in this week because we have three matches and a travel day," he said. "So we'll have some light practices and focus on adjustments we can make to get ready for those next matches."

Nitrogen fertilizer prices soar

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The price of nitrogen fertilizer has reached an all-time high this year because of an increase in foreign trade, natural gas and energy prices, and a decrease of fertilizer plants in the U.S.

Dave Mengel, professor of agronomy, said the cost of nitrogen fertilizer is "out the roof" and will most likely continue to rise in coming years.

Mengel said the main ingredient in nitrogen fertilizer is natural gas, which has more than doubled in price over the past five years. He also said the cost increase stems from the number of fertilizer plants that have been shut down within the last decade.

"For example," he said, "there used to be [a plant] in Lawrence, but that's been closed now for the last seven or eight years. So we don't have the capacity to produce nitrogen fertilizer, and this past year, we grew more corn than we have ever grown. So there was low capacity and great demand, which puts upward pressure on prices, too."

This, Mengel said, leaves the country more dependent on fertilizer imports from larger and newer production facilities in Jamaica and other Caribbean countries, the Middle East and Russia. Because nitrogen fertilizer production has turned into a competitive world market, Mengel said the world price has increased in addition to local costs.

But no matter how high the prices reach, Mengel said there will always be a demand for nitrogen fertilizer because it is essential to a healthy crop yield.

"In your own diet," Mengel said, "proteins are an important part. [In crops], nitrogens are a component of that protein. Nitrogen is not stored in soils, so either you use it or you lose it."

Another important element for a healthy crop diet is phosphorus. This can be stored in soils, so not all farmers have to fertilize every year. However, Mengel said, the phosphorus levels in Kansas

Aluminum cow stolen

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 2,000-pound spotted black and white aluminum cow statue was stolen Sunday night from 2301 Claflin Road, according to a Riley County Police Department report.

Police located the cow on 1100 Osage St. and the $1,500 cow was returned to its original location at the Riley County Historical Society. The cow, named Sadie, was put on the Goodnow House lawn in celebration of Kansas Day on Jan. 29, said Cheryl Collins, director of the Riley County Historical Museum. The historical society left the cow outside for decoration, she said.

"The police did a wonderful job of finding her and last night we put her back in the barn," Collins said. "We would have really missed our cow, Sadie."

Lt. Kurt Moldrup said he suspects the cow was stolen as a prank.

Students struggle to find balance in campus activities

By David Griffin, Jr.
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a planner jammed full of appointments, reminders, assignments and organization meetings, some students have become overwhelmed trying to find a balance.

With more than 400 student organizations at K-State and leadership opportunities in each, it is crucial for students to maintain a healthy balance, said Candice Hironaka, associate director of Leadership Studies and Programs.

"Finding that balance between academics, which is the primary reason they're here, versus all of their activities, sometimes can become an imbalance for students," Hironaka said.

She suggested students become involved in extracurricular activities that involve their majors.

"It's always good to get involved in something within your major or within your college," Hironaka said.

Being overwhelmed with too many commitments is not always the only concern for students. Sometimes other obligations like family or health can cause stress.

"You have to make choices at times, so if you have more than what can fit in a day, it's going to be stressful," said Fred Newton, director of counseling services.

Newton said the hardest choice for students can be deciding what they want to get involved in and when to let go.

"Sometimes what students don't like about that is they don't want to limit what they're doing, but at the same time, they want to do very well; sometimes you can't hardly balance that," Newton said.

Ann Virgo, junior in marketing, is a prime example of a student with a seemingly overloaded day-planner. Virgo plans her day to a tee. With involvement in organizations like St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center, Gamma Phi Beta sorority, Silver Key sophomore honorary and New Student Services, she depends on a planner.

"I usually have at least one meeting per day. I'm pretty active in my church on the weekends," Virgo said. "Homework usually comes pretty late at night; I'm usually up pretty early so sleeping is usually not a very long activity."

Virgo said stress is something students cannot escape.

"Stress is going to be there whether you're a busy student or not, and for me, I have to keep things in perspective for what I want to do and get done in my day," she said.

For Virgo, balancing a busy schedule gives her a sense of accomplishment, and though she has made it work for her, other students might feel stressed handling the same load.

"What works for one student isn't going to work for the next student," Hironaka said.

Robert Gomez, junior in elementary education, is involved in several different organizations, ranging from Sigma Lambda Beta International Fraternity to the Developing Scholars Program. He said he had to evaluate his activities and choose which ones to commit to and which ones to drop.

"My first two years, I always felt like I had to do everything for everybody else, and I ended up getting sick a lot," said Gomez.

After a while, Gomez noticed his schedule was overwhelming and decided to make some changes.

Gomez said students must take into consideration that they are only human, and though they might think they can be involved in everything, "sometimes that's not the case."

"Learning to say no, the biggest change was I realized I can't do everything, so I'd rather focus on the things I really enjoy and the things I'm passionate about," Gomez said.

K-state offers free animal poison control help line

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is a pet owner's worst nightmare. They come home to find trash strewn across the living room and their dog lying helplessly beside it. Something is definitely wrong, but, in a panic, the owner is at a loss for action. What should they do?

Thanks to assistant professor of toxicology Dr. Deon van der Merwe, and the K-State toxicology department, owners of animals large and small have somewhere to turn in these emergencies.

The K-State animal poison information service line is available 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Monday through Friday, and is free of charge, van der Merwe said. The line receives about five to 10 calls each day and is able to give information and advice for domestic pets and also farm animals that might have been poisoned, he said.

Van der Merwe said if an animal is showing any peculiar behavior, service line operators are always willing to help.

"[Symptoms of poisoning] can vary tremendously," he said, "but in general, it's something that causes the animal to vomit or have diarrhea or behave abnormally. It might show abnormal muscle movements or become very lethargic - very sleepy. Signs of redness or pain or swelling on the skin in and around the mouth, or if it is producing a lot of saliva is also a common indicator."

Van der Merwe said it is sometimes hard to tell to what extent an animal has been poisoned, so owners should never hesitate to call the service line.

Dr. Ken Harkin, small animal veterinarian for the K-State Veterinary Teaching Hospital, said many poison incidents are likely to occur around the house. He said owners should treat their pets like they would small

CITY COMMISSION

City Council discusses contracts, transportation, child care issues

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners approved the purchase of property owned by O'Reilly's Auto Parts for approximately $1.9 million Tuesday night.

Jason Hilgers, assistant city manager, presented the purchase and lease agreements to the council during a special session. The purchase agreement included the purchase of O'Reilly's property and its new location, closing costs, and realtor fees incurred through Dial Realty and the building O'Reilly's must build to replace its current location.

A separate lease agreement allowed O'Reilly's to remain in its current location until the new building has been built. Hilgers said the new building should be completed within four to six months after finalizing the agreements.

Hilgers told city council members the new property will be located on the corner of Juliette Avenue and Fort Riley Boulevard. He also said the lease agreement with O'Reilly's would not interfere with the projected demolition of the area for the south-end redevelopment project, slated to begin late summer or early fall. Four other property owners have signed lease agreements that will end in July.

The commission continued to debate whether or not to enter into this agreement with O'Reilly's because of the price of the purchase. Commissioner Bob Strawn asked Hilgers how far over budget the city was in the south end redevelopment project before voting. Hilgers said thus far, the city was $2.7 million over the $12 million budget, and Strawn begrudgingly voted with the commission in a 5-0 decision to proceed with the purchase and lease agreements with O'Reilly's.

WORK SESSION

The first agenda item during the City Commission work session discussed the improvements to the Fort Riley Boulevard-Davis Drive intersection.

Zack Stone, project manager for Schwab-Eaton, P.A., presented three different options of design for the intersection. Stone said the city could leave the intersection as is, but add signal lights or a roundabout.

Stone said Kansas Department of Transportation performed traffic studies upon their request in 2006. Fort Riley Boulevard scored an A in providing movement of traffic through the intersection, but scored an F for providing movement of vehicles on Davis Drive in the study.

Stone opposed adding lights and paths for pedestrians and bicyclists at the intersection because of the high speeds maintained on Fort Riley Boulevard.

Right now, the speed limit through the intersection is 55 mph. KDOT reported 85 percent of the vehicles travel at a rate of 59.4 mph through the intersection and recommended the speed limit remain the same, Stone said.

"People may be comfortable at driving above the posted speed limit, [but that] doesn't mean it's safe to drive through that intersection," Commissioner James Sherow said.

Stone said the cost of building the traffic signals should be minimal with a cost of about $500,000, excluding utility costs. He proposed a signal light, advanced signs and beacons, an extended westbound turn lane and a traffic island be installed on Davis Drive blocking left turning into the Westview Community Church.

The second presentation came from the Social Services Advisory Board. The board proposed providing public transportation to residents in the form of a scheduled bus system, and asked for increased funding for child care services provided to residents.

"We're talking about job growth," said Jeff Chapman, vice chair of SSAB. "Not everybody can afford transportation."

Chapman said there are 22 transportation services in Manhattan, but all of them are designed as on-demand only. This means a person needing transportation must contact one of the service providers on demand.

"No one has taken a responsible role ... on providing public transportation," Chapman said. "[SSAB doesn't] want to go to these 22 agencies and make it their responsibility [either]."

Commissioner Bruce Snead said the city commission had developed a public transportation two-way bus route in anticipation to receiving funding from the federal government in 2010 when the U.S. census would count Manhattan's population around 50,000 residents. The new population status allows Manhattan to qualify for new funding for projects such as a public transportation system.

"We developed a comprehensive two-way fixed route that was going to be funded by federal, state, city and the university," Snead said. "A public transportation service needs to serve the university."

SSAB member, Christopher Renner, presented the proposal for increased funding of child care to the commission.

Snead said the military families moving into the area expected high standards for child care due to the high standards the military provides for its service families on base.

Warren Theatres propose Manhattan location in downtown redevelopment

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan could acquire a second large movie theater in less than three years.

City commissioners listened to demonstrations from Warren Theatres about the proposed theater and complaints and advice from Manhattan residents about downtown redevelopment plans last night at a special City Commission work session.

The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the overall south project redevelopment plan, which includes the 12-plex Warren Theater, a hotel, a restaurant and a discovery center.

Ken Crockett, vice president of Warren Theatres, said the proposed theater would have a large, well-lit parking lot, spacious bathrooms, a diner, a balcony with alcoholic beverages available and several other features found in other Warren Theatres, which are located in Wichita.

"We have decided to make the movie-going experience not just for the movies, but for the theaters as well," Crockett said.

After a short video of a theater similar to the one he said he would like to build in Manhattan, Crockett explained the problems with the current building site proposal.

"We think the proposal of the theater [30,000 square feet] is too small," he said.

Crockett said the building should be 50,000 square feet.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said he was pleased with the proposed Warren theater. "I think anything that brings more people to that district and exposes them to what's there will be an asset. [The area being developed] is designed to be a district of attractions."

The theater is projected to attract more than 350,000 to 400,000 people each year if Warren's proposal is approved.

The issue of ticket prices was brought up and quickly addressed by Crockett. He said Warren ticket prices are similar to other local theaters' prices.

After Mayor Tom Phillips opened the meeting for public comment after the presentation, the proposed discovery center/museum became the center of interest for a majority of the session speakers.

Lauren Ritterbush, Manhattan resident and K-State associate professor of archaeology, addressed the board about the proposed discovery center's sustenance during the open period. She said museums typically do not make enough revenue to cover costs.

She explained the need for a "friends of the museum" program and fundraising to sustain the museum.

Ritterbush explained many problems with the museum's plan, including the organization of museum staff.

"The market analysis says the museum director is also the curator. These are two separate entities," Ritterbush said. "The museum director is the person who works on the foundation and helps to get money. They are not the person who knows the ins and outs of the exhibits at the museum, which is what the curator does."

When Ritterbush finished, Phillips asked her to stay at the podium.

"I'm going to recruit you," Phillips said, saying she should be one of the people thoroughly involved in projects like the discovery center.

Karen Mayes, president of the League of Women Voters, told commissioners she was dissatisfied with the parking plan in the south project redevelopment plan.

After the commissioners concluded her copy of the plan was outdated, they addressed her concern about large-truck maneuverability on Fourth Street after the project is complete.

Commissioner Bob Strawn said truck drivers could leave Hy-Vee in the north project area and travel south on Fourth Street to get back on Fort Riley Boulevard. Strawn said the regulation of commercial traffic would be discussed in further work sessions.

Commissioner James Sherow said the board would have nearly three years to work out the problems with the south project redevelopment plan.

TO THE POINT

Overworked students need to take break

The stresses of college life can be overwhelming at times. Commitment to academics, part-time and full-time employment and membership in campus organizations are how many students define their time in college. But it is easy to become over-involved, and students can be stretched too thin before they have a chance to enjoy their involvement.

Student participation and involvement is what makes K-State such an outstanding institution, and opportunities like Student Government Association and all-campus organizations could not happen without the commitment of students. But we as students must pace ourselves and allow some time to relax and enjoy relationships and free time. If students do not take time every now and then to breathe, they risk burning themselves out, and this can ruin the activities that the students care about.

At no other time will students have to opportunity to be around so many different people who are in their age group and have the same goal of graduating. We should not fear having fun from time to time, nor should we fear having a lot on our respective plates.

Most of us are busy, and need some time to relax after a long day, week or semester. We must take time to enjoy the activities of which we are a part, rather than just hoping they will look appealing on a résumé.

We should all participate in some way on campus, whether it's simply going to class or running for a student governmental position. But we must remember that college only happens once, and it's OK to enjoy oneself every now and then.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Tax rebate stimulus plan awards those who don't pay

In May, the United States federal government will begin giving some tax dollars back to many U.S. citizens, so they can all go out and spur the economy.

President Bush first issued his proposal for a stimulus package during this year's State of the Union Address. President Bush's original proposal would issue checks to all tax-paying individuals — the people who actually pay for the government.

During a Jan. 24 press conference, reported by MSNBC, Bush said the tax rebates would be an "effective, robust temporary set of incentives" to help curb the threat of recession.

This tax rebate package is nice to have, however, the president used the word "temporary" to describe the rebates. Typically every eight years the United States will go through a recession period.

Many forget Bush inherited a slight recession in the first few years of his presidency from the tech-stock crash at the end of former President Clinton's term. This recession comes on the back of the recent fall of the housing market.

Fueled by the same get-rich-quick feelings tech stocks provided, the housing market is going through a shakeoff of its own, where most foreclosures are happening to debtors who believed they could flip multiple homes but couldn't make payments on the homes.

The United States was able to fight off the recession eight years ago with a series of tax rebates and cuts Bush pushed through after becoming president. He believes the United States can do it again if they follow the same plan as before.

BRETT KING

In the spirit of bipartisan support, Democrats in Congress championed "checks for everyone," because we can't exclude those who don't pay for the system to operate.

A typical definition of everyone is all people in a given area, but a congressional Democrats' definition is, according to the Associated Press on Jan. 24, anyone making at least $3,000, but no more than $75,000.

According to Fox Business, the $150 billion tax rebate stimulus package would give $300 to individuals who made at least $3,000 last year until they are qualified for income tax.

Most people forced to pay taxes would receive $600, as long as the individual doesn't make more than $75,000.

If over that number, $30 is decreased for every additional $1,000 made. Couples with children will receive $1,200, plus $300 for every child.

After the deductions from the rebate check to those making more than $75,000, individuals making more than $95,000 will not receive their tax rebate. In this bipartisan, backwards tax rebate system, those who pay the most in taxes receive the least, if anything back.

Individuals who receive these checks are more likely to save or use these checks to pay off debts they have accumulated from our last call of "go out and buy something for yourself" drives to spur the economy.

Even though most college students are excited to receive a check back, most do not deserve the money; giving to those who do not pay, on the basis of entitlement and equality, is absolutely ridiculous.

When checks arrive, those who actually pay taxes should be saying, "It is about time I get my money back." All those who don't pay for the system should be thanking friends and neighbors for the free ride they are about to receive.

Religious differences should not be focus in War on Terror

Since Sept. 11, 2001, there has been debate among the religious sects in our world as to whether we are in a religious war between Judeo-Christian beliefs and Islam. Such speculation is untrue and dangerous, especially on the United States' side of the spectrum.

GRADY BOLDING

However, for at least one talk radio host, we are on the verge of a showdown of biblical proportions. Recently, the Council for Islamic and American Relations has come under fire from radical right-wing talk radio host Michael Savage.

After the council used clips of Savage giving anti-Islamic statements and attempted to get him fired for hate-speech violations in the city of San Francisco, Savage chose to sue the organization for "copyright issues."

There are several quotes from Savage regarding his opinions on Islam, but his comments on his radio show, "The Savage Nation," sum it all up.

On his Oct. 29, 2007, show, Savage said, "I don't wanna hear one more word about Islam. Take your religion and shove it up your behind. I'm sick of you."

However crude he might seem, Savage feels he is correct in voicing these sentiments, especially when looking at documents of radical Muslims of the past.

Take the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. In his 1942 publication, "Islam Is Not a Religion of Pacifists," Khomeini basically lays the foundation for radical Islam.

"Those who know nothing of Islam pretend that Islam counsels against war. Those are witless. Islam says: Kill all the unbelievers just as they would kill you all," Khomeini wrote.

People like Savage use statements like this to justify the "Judeo-Christian vs. Muslim" notion. Even religious leaders have made statements to push this idea on

In March 2002, the late Rev. Jerry Falwell stated some of his opinions of the War on Terror.

"This 'turn the other cheek' business is all well and good, but it's not what Jesus fought and died for," Falwell said. "What we need to do is take the battle to the Muslim heathens and do unto them before they do unto us."

There are strikingly close parallels in these two sayings, even over a short period of time. However, it's when such sayings are taken seriously that tragedy strikes.

Chuck Sudetic's book, "Blood and Vengeance: One Family's Story of the War in Bosnia," tells the story of Visegrad, a town in eastern Bosnia-Herzegovina during the 1991-95 civil war.

After a local Muslim fanatic declared jihad on Serb Christians, Serbs retaliated by leading the entire Muslim population of the town to a nearby bridge. There, they slaughtered men, women and children in a variety of ways; the most popular method was throwing victims from the bridge and shooting them as they fell into the river.

In the end, more than 3,000 innocent people died. Furthermore, according to for the former Yugoslavia documents, from the International Criminal Tribunal 119 of these people were children.

The story is a grisly one, but in the end, one needs to look at the results. The "crime" of these poor souls: being Muslim.

Fighting the War on Terror should never be fought on the basis of religion from the side of the Western powers. Examples such as these show the dangers of fighting on the basis of religion.

For some, like Savage, saying such controversial statements might be emotionally freeing. But there is always the risk that one could act on such hateful rhetoric. In the end, everyone suffers the consequences. History is all the evidence you need.

CAMPUS NEWS AT OTHER UNIVERSITIES

STUDENTS PREPARE FOR 1ST EXCHANGE PROGRAM BETWEEN U.S. COLLEGE, SAUDI ARABIA SCHOOL

THE CHRONICLE | DUKE

Students in the Muslim Cultures Focus group will make history this Valentine's Day.

In the first exchange program of its kind, nine Focus students - six freshmen and three sophomores - plan to depart for Saudi Arabia Thursday. The students will travel around the country for a week prior to attending the Jeddah Economic Forum for an additional week as part of their Focus learning experience. The trip will be paid for by corporate sponsors and previous fundraising.

The conference, created in 1999, serves as a think tank for economic policy in the Middle East. Its featured speakers will include Prince Charles of Great Britain, former chairman of the Federal Reserve Alan Greenspan and Nobel Laureate Muhammad Yunus.

Eleven students from several Saudi Arabian colleges arrived on Duke's campus Thursday as part of the exchange program. The students have spent the last week visiting local businesses and research institutions and enjoying elements of Duke's culture. The Saudi students will then return to their country with the Duke students after traveling to Washington, D.C.

"It's the first time that there has been this kind of student exchange program between a U.S. university and Saudi Arabian colleges," said Kelly Jarrett, program director of the Duke Islamic Studies Center.

She added that students will only visit cities on a list preapproved by the university and will partake in activities planned by Effat College, a Saudi women's college. The Focus students will be accompanied by a senior, two students from the Nicholas School of the Environment and Earth Sciences, Bruce Lawrence, professor of religion and director of the DISC, and a member of the DISC board throughout the trip.

Students said they were anxious and excited about the experience.

"I'm not sure what to expect about what the culture is going to be like and how they're going to respond to us as foreigners," freshman Yasmina Chergui said.

She added that she is aware of the strict discrimination by gender and will plan accordingly.

"In certain cities, we should have the veil around our neck or just have it handy," Chergui said.

Female students must wear an abaya, a loose dark-colored robe, while in Saudi Arabia, in accordance with the laws, Chergui added.

CU PRESIDENT CANDIDATE SCRUTINIZED

CAMPUS PRESS | COLORADO

Bruce Benson is under scrutiny by University of Colorado students for his policies and past criminal record that includes a DUI and a domestic violence dispute.

According to the Colorado Bureau of Investigation records, Benson, who was recently named the sole candidate for university president by the CU Board of Regents, received a citation for driving under the influence of alcohol on April 10, 1980.

A story that ran in the New York Times during Benson's campaign for Colorado governor in 1994 cited information about an affidavit concerning a threat to his ex-wife, Nancy Benson. Mrs. Benson said her husband had "harassed, taunted and threatened" her. The records also disclosed that Mr. Benson had been having an affair for two years before he asked for a divorce, to which he has admitted.

The article also mentioned that in the divorce records, which are now sealed, Benson had told his son he was "going to kill" his former wife.

In a news conference after the disclosures, Benson said that he regretted saying he would kill his wife, and that having an affair was a mistake.

"I've fully admitted the errors of the ways of my life," he said.

Alice Shallcross, sophomore in integrative physiology and Spanish, said she believes personal matters might not necessarily depict the kind of leader Benson might be.

"We are the ones affected by everything he will do," Shallcross said. "If he messes up, we're going to feel the effects of it."

During an open forum with Benson, another student addressed the subject of his DUIs.

"You make a mistake, you stand up and admit it," Benson said. "It was an awful long time ago. I think it's been addressed in the past. I don't think it looks bad."

Ken McConnellogue, the associate vice president for university relations, said "the DUIs are a matter of record, and they are what they are."

HOUSE ATTEMPTS TO DECREASE PRICE OF TEXTBOOKS

THE MIAMI STUDENT MIAMI UNIVERSITY OF OHIO

In an effort to assist college students with the high costs of education, Congress has taken the next step in passing a bill to help students cope with the price of textbooks.

The House of Representatives voted on Feb. 7 to require tighter regulations for colleges and publishers in the College Opportunity and Affordability Act. If the bill becomes law, it would reinstate portions of the Higher Education Act, which is the law that governs federal student aid.

The College Opportunity and Affordability Act would require publishers to promote custom textbooks for the purpose of eliminating the high expenses of packaged books.

Under the bill, textbook prices could be cheaper because they would be sold individually rather than packaged with other publications.

By informing bookstores of what books they will use, instructors can increase the buyback price to students and increase the number of used books available for them to buy, said Charles Schmidt, spokesperson for the National Association of College Stores (NACS), the professional trade association that represents the collegiate retail industry.

Additionally, publishers would be required to show a disclosure. In all promotional materials, publishers would need to note their textbooks' wholesale prices, the copyright dates of previous editions, summaries of substantial content revisions and the availability of the book in paperback.

In addition, the bill would require universities to list the course material that would be required within the course catalog, which is the directory of classes that students may register for in the following semester.

Schmidt said the bill would increase industry transparency, mandating textbook requirements to be listed along with class registration lists. This would allow students to be aware of additional finances prior to the beginning of a class.

Chinese students have interactive breakfast with Chinese ambassador

By David Griffin, Jr. KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chinese Ambassador H.E. Zhou Wenzhong spoke directly to more than 250 Chinese K-State students at a breakfast Tuesday morning at the K-State Alumni Center.

During his speech, Zhou expressed how pleased he was with the number of Chinese students who attend K-State, and how important it is to the students' futures that they are here.

Jim Lewis, director of international pre-admissions and recruiting, said the ambassador's visit reflected K-State's good relationship with Chinese students.

"It shows that they made a good choice to come to K-State. I think a lot of students are very pleased that the ambassador came," he said.

Though the breakfast was at 8 a.m., the ambassador's speech drew a large crowd.

The faces of those in attendance expressed joy, and their comments and body language displayed pride to be in the presence of such an important figure in their native community.

K-State continues to work on the recruitment of Chinese students.

During recent years, the number of Chinese students has grown largely because of recruiting efforts, Lewis said.

Charles Reagan, associate to the president and Landon Lecture Series chairman, said the university is very committed to its efforts to appeal to Chinese students.

"We have taken steps to get more Chinese students here; we have an office in Beijing, and we have a representative who goes to college fairs and visits with high school students and their parents, gives them literature and answers questions about K-State," Reagan said.

This visit by Ambassador Zhou was not only important to the Chinese students, but to the university as a whole, said President Jon Wefald.

"It was an important day yesterday when we had the ambassador from China to America here, just to help educate K-State students about China, its history, its culture and its powerful economy of 2008," Wefald said.

"We have about 300 Chinese students here and I think for them to know that the very ambassador from the whole country of China is here, I think it gives them great enthusiasm for being here at K-State to know that we're not so far away."

K-State earns 5-2 victory over ranked WSU team

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the doubles point on the line and K-State's No. 2 doubles team of freshman Antea Huljev and senior Viviana Yrureta already down 0-3, securing the coveted doubles point did not seem likely.

But through resilient play, Huljev and Yrureta were able to battle back, defeating Wichita State's Stephanie Dalmacio and Laryssa Ferreira, 8-6 and secured the doubles point for the Wildcats on their way to a 5-2 win over Wichita State on Tuesday. Coach Steve Bietau said he knew winning the doubles point against the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's No. 33-ranked Shockers would be a challenge.

"I thought it would be tough," he said. "Antea and Vivi did a good job of fighting back and getting back into that match. Antea hit a couple of key serves at the end and we were fortunate to get the doubles point."

Huljev and Yrureta's success at securing the doubles point showed the Wildcat's improvement over the past few weeks, Yrureta said.

"Well, I think we came back pretty good," Yrureta said. "We started down 3-0 and we came back. It was a tough match the whole time. I think our game is getting a lot better. I think we're doing a lot better than we were in the beginning."

In other doubles action, senior Olga Klimova and junior Katerina Kudlackova faced a challenge against Wichita State's No. 1 team of Lenore Lazaroiu and Anna Egorova. The WSU duo went on to capture the win, 8-2.

K-State's French connection of freshmen Vanessa Cottin and Pauline Guemas captured an 8-4 win in the No. 3 doubles spot. The win tied the two teams and forced Huljev and Yrureta to secure the doubles point for the Wildcats.

"They were our most solid spot in the doubles," Bietau said. "They showed some resilience that none of our other teams did. [It's] something you don't always expect from young players."

Strong play from K-State carried over into singles play, where the Wildcats won four out of the six matches. Yrureta topped Dalmacio, 6-3, 1-6, 6-2 at the No. 1 singles spot; No. 2 singles player Cottin defeated Egorova, 7-5, 6-3; No. 3 singles player Kudlackova beat Browning 2-6, 6-3, 6-3; and Natasha Vieira beat Hanisch, 7-6, 7-4, 7-5, at the No. 4 singles spot. Wichita State won the matches in both the No. 5 and No. 6 spots.

Kudlackova's match ultimately secured the win for the Wildcats.

"I think it's pretty big," Yrureta. "We still have to get better for the teams we play down the road."

In the end, Bietau said he was pleased with the Wildcats' play.

"It was the first of five matches where we're really going to be tested," he said. "This was an awfully good start."

State court to handle Rodriguez lawsuit

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. - The lawsuit over a $4 million buyout clause in the contract of former West Virginia football coach Rich Rodriguez will be heard in state court.

WVU is essentially an arm of state government, not an independent agency, and lawsuits involving state government can be heard only in the state court system, U.S. District Judge John P. Bailey said Monday.

He sent the case back to Monongalia County Circuit Court in Morgantown, where it was filed Dec. 27 after Rodriguez resigned to take the head coaching job at Michigan.

His abrupt departure ended a successful seven-year run with the Mountaineers, left the team without a head coach just weeks before the Fiesta Bowl and touched off a bitter, continuing public feud.

"The university obviously agrees with the decision of the court and has always felt that the proper place for this action was the Circuit Court of Monongalia County," said WVU attorney Jeff Wakefield. "We believe the Circuit Court will be very fair in its consideration and handling of this matter."

Rodriguez attorney Marv Robon could not immediately be reached for comment.

FITNESS

Workout drink choice depends on ones health preferences

You probably have seen the commercials talking about Propel Fitness Water and how it has only 25 calories compared to vitamin waters that have 250 calories. Which is better before, during or after workouts? Which tastes better?

A scientific evening of label-comparing and taste-testing eight different water alternatives concluded that the best product depends on your selection criteria. All the drinks that were compared come in 20-ounce bottles, which actually amounts to two-and-a-half servings, so watch how much you drink of any of these products.

KENDALL HALL

VITAMIN-HEAVY DRINK: LIFE WATER BY SOBE

If you're looking for a drink to supply you with vitamins and other feel-good ingredients, Life Water by Sobe is your best bet. At 40 per serving, Life Water has the fewest calories compared to Glaceau's Vitamin Water and Snapple's Antioxidant Water.

Life Water also has 100 percent of your Vitamin C intake for the day and was the only drink with niacin, a component of Vitamin B. However, the Snapple Antioxidant Water was the only drink with calcium. And while the Glaceau Vitamin Water had more B vitamins, it also had caffeine. As far as taste was concerned, Sobe Life Water was by far the best, because the other two drinks were too watered down.

DURING OR AFTER WORKOUT DRINK: WATER

If you are looking for something to drink during or after your workouts, regular water is still the best. Unless you are doing high-intensity exercise for more than two hours, you really don't need all the extra stuff in sports drinks. But if you insist on a beverage with a little something extra, the healthiest choice is Propel Fitness Water. Even though it tastes super-sugary, it has the least amount of calories, sugar, carbohydrates and sodium per serving.

ELECTROLYTES: POWERADE OR G2

If you want the extra calories and sodium, which some people will translate into electrolytes, then you should be reaching for Powerade, which has 17 grams of carbohydrates. Another alternative would be Gatorade, or the new G2, both of which have 110 milligrams of sodium. All of these drinks come in 32 to 33.8-ounce bottles, or approximately four servings. You can buy smaller sizes, but G2 is the hardest to find because it is so new.

If you are a Gatorade fanatic, but want a low-calorie option, G2 is perfect for you. It tastes exactly like regular Gatorade, but has half the calories.

PROTEIN WATER: KELLOGG'S K20

Another new beverage is Kellogg's

K20 Protein Water, marketed as a product to "keep the edge off hunger." This product has five grams of protein and five grams of fiber to help you feel full. One 16-ounce bottle has only 50 calories. It also has a few vitamins and calcium. It does contain a milk ingredient, though, to warn those who need to be cautious of dairy products. It tastes like a protein shake without the thickness that more people find unappealing. This product is great for between meals or after a workout when you crave a little protein.

There is a water-alternative out there for everyone, no matter what you want in a drink, whether you think taste, calorie-count or vitamin C content is most important. When choosing a drink, be aware of the serving size, as well as the calorie and sugar content. Just remember there is also nothing wrong with plain old water.

Weis gives up play-calling

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SOUTH BEND, Ind. - Notre Dame coach Charlie Weis, who built his coaching reputation as a play-caller while helping the New England Patriots win three Super Bowls, won't be calling plays for the Fighting Irish next season.

Offensive coordinator Mike Haywood will call plays so Weis, coming off a dismal 3-9 season, can concentrate on his duties as head coach.

"I think that when you're play-calling on offense, you might not necessarily be the best head coach. So what I'm trying to do is I'm trying to be a better head coach," he said.

"I just felt that I had to, after this past season, figure out a laundry list of things on and off the field that I wanted to make better, and this was one of them," he said.

Staying in college for education is better choice for Michael Beasley

Michael Jordan, Magic Johnson, Charles Barkley and Larry Bird. What do those four Hall of Famers have in common?

They are all on the NBA's list of 50 greatest players, they all have elements of their game similar to K-State's own freshman forward, Michael Beasley, and they all played significant roles on their respective teams upon entering the NBA as rookies.

An increasing number of young high school basketball players are eventually faced with a difficult decision: Take the money and join the NBA, or accept the scholarship and go to college? In recent years, there has been a surge of athletes jumping straight from high school to the NBA.

The NBA decided to put a stop to it in 2005 by imposing a rule that a player had to be 19 before making the jump to the professional ranks. Now, America's best young talent is forced to attend prep school or go to college. Michael Beasley is no exception.

Most kids would just go to the NBA after one year. They see big money, the high-profile life and think they are ready.

However, in reality, many players are unable to deal with the rigorous regimen of playing basketball every day against the some of the best players in the world.

EXHIBIT A: KEVIN DURANT, FORWARD, SEATTLE SUPERSONICS

The 6-foot-9 rookie was college's best player last year. He was a unanimous first team All-American and the second pick in the NBA draft. His lack of strength - he was unable to bench press 185 pounds at pre-draft workout - shows in the more physical brand of NBA basketball. He struggled to find his shot that came so effortlessly against the lesser talent of college basketball.

EXHIBIT B: KWAME BROWN, LOS ANGELES LAKERS

After a stellar high school career, Brown was drafted first overall by the Washington Wizards in 2001. His career has been anything but spectacular. Averaging a miniscule 7.6 points and 5.7 rebounds per game, he has done little to prove himself worthy of the No. 1 overall pick.

EXHIBITS C, D, E AND F: MICHAEL JORDAN, MAGIC JOHNSON, CHARLES BARKLEY AND LARRY BIRD.

Michael Jordan went to college for three years at North Carolina. You know the rest of the story.

After four years at Michigan State, Magic Johnson was named to the all-rookie team and led the Lakers to a championship his rookie year.

Charles Barkley went to Auburn for three years and averaged nearly 17 points and 11 rebounds his first two years.

Larry Bird spent four years at Indiana State and averaged a double-double during his first six years in the NBA.

Some might counter this argument with the fact that Kobe Bryant, Kevin Garnett and Tracy McGrady are phenoms who never went to college. But I challenge them to look at each player's career statistics. You will see a significant increase in production after their first two or three years. They would have been better off staying in college for those first few years.

Of course there are exceptions to this argument, like LeBron James and Carmelo Anthony. LeBron came straight out of high school and was an immediate superstar. Carmelo spent a season in college, winning a championship at Syracuse and jumped to the NBA where he also became a superstar. However, these exceptions are few and far between.

Of the 50 players on the NBA's All-Time Greatest Players list, four spent less than three years in college. I'm not saying Michael Beasley won't be a superstar some day in the NBA - there is no doubt in my mind that he will.

I just think he would be better served to stay at K-State another year or two and really develop his game so he can become a marvel at the next level. History is not in his favor, but the choice is ultimately up to him.

Parody film just like others

"Meet the Spartans"

☆☆☆☆

Review by Alex Peak

A word to the wise: Don't "Meet the Spartans."

The entertainment industry is already over-saturated with spoofs. It's already bad enough that we have to wade through puddles of Britney Spears, Ryan Seacrest and Paris Hilton jokes.

"Meet the Spartans" pokes fun at everything from the latest ludicrous behavior of celebrities to movies like "300" and "Bring it On." The movie is just an extension of "Not Another Teen Movie" or "Scary Movie" with a new spin: Spartans, homosexuality, spray-on muscles and Carmen Electra.

Without watching "300" before hand, audience members might have a cordial giggle here and there, but won't really get the gist of the movie.

The entire 84 minutes involved the main character Leonidas working with a team of Spartans to defend their homeland from invading Persians.

Overall, the story line is weak. I can imagine the writer and director sitting around and saying, "Let's make fun of '300' as much as possible, beat the children, look and act licentious, and throw in a few 'Brangelina' jokes to keep things interesting. Bring a morbidly obese, hairy guy into the film, and we're set."

I'm embarrassed to admit I agreed to see this movie. But, if nothing else, I at least realized the importance of moviegoers demanding better entertainment. We no longer deserve the sloppy-second tomfooleries we're so accustomed to.

Bluemont offers V-Day alternative

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An intimate setting and delicious desserts are only two of the special features the Bluemont Buffet will have for Valentine's Day.

In order to accommodate extra customers for a special event like the Valentine's Day buffet, organizers will seat guests in the K-State Student Union Ballroom and also the Flint Hills, Sunflower and Cottonwood Rooms.

Shelley Wegele, catering manager for Chartwells, said the other rooms will help to create an intimate atmosphere.

"It's cozier," Wegele said. "It kind of sets the Valentine's theme."

As with other specialty buffets throughout the semester, the Valentine's Day buffet will cost $8.25. The desserts are expected to be popular items, and the menu is filled with them.

The main menu items are also expected to attract a lot of customers. The non-dessert menu will feature pepper lime chicken, vegetarian lasagna and carved grain mustard en-crust pork loin.

"We are going to have the ever-famous candy hearts and assorted cupcakes and cookies," Wegele said. "There's also going to be cheesecake."

Pre-payment and reservations are recommended to speed up the line, as Chartwells is expecting a large turnout, Wegele said.

Last year an about 250 people went to the Valentine's Day buffet, and Wegele said more might attend Thursday.

Late struggles

Colbert, Conan remain strong without writers; others fail to find original content

As many know, the writers strike has taken its toll on television. There have been numerous postponements and cancellations, but a few of the late night shows decided to go back on the air to please their fans.

While this seemed like a good idea at the beginning, those late night shows would have done a better service to their fans by staying off the air.

What follows is a review of four of the late night shows that decided to brave the writer-less waters.

"LATE NIGHT WITH CONAN O'BRIEN"

Conan seems to be the late-night comic who has had the easiest time since the writers strike, and he is also the only one who managed to save any sort of comedy for his opening monologue.

Unlike Jay Leno and David Letterman, Conan somehow continually comes up with funny jokes for the show's first few minutes. For one of his recent shows, Conan hired performers dressed in colorful, puffy shirts to dance wildly behind him after each punch line. Like with most everything else he does, the crowd ate up the dancers' spectacle and cheered loudly every time they came on. The funniest part of the monologue came when Conan donned a jacket similar to the dancers and began dancing with them.

Conan also has the right idea with what he does with the time between his monologue and interviews. Rather than filling the time with stupid jokes or lame time-killers, He decided to fill his segments with funny, creative alternatives.

The other night, for example, Conan unveiled his newest invention for the audience: a mobile desk. He got a telescopic platform and built a desk on it. He used the mobile desk to drive all over the studio. Not only was it a stroke of time-killing genius, the crowd responded well to the increased interaction.

Overall, Conan's show has not been adversely affected by the strike, but there is only so long he can go until he runs out of ideas.

"LATE SHOW WITH DAVID LETTERMAN"

Despite regaining the services of his own writers a few weeks ago, the late-night host is having the hardest time with the strike is David Letterman.

His opening monologue has never been particularly strong and has taken a severe hit in the wake of the writers' walkout.

Letterman cut a few minutes from the monologue to allow more time for conversations with Paul Schaffer, which usually turn out to be less than desirable.

Instead of working harder to come up with funny jokes, Letterman turned to cheap gimmicks and skits to fill the time.

In one show, Letterman answered a ringing phone on his desk. Rather than witty, well-thought-out jokes on the other end, viewers were treated to an unclear, garbled police radio. This happened throughout the show and every time the phone rang, the message became more and more unclear and less and less funny.

The only shining stars from the "Late Show" are the segments that Letterman is not in. Andy Kindler, "Late Show" correspondent, traveled to various life coaches to see what they had to say about his life.

All of the comedy in the sketch came from the coaches bashing Kindler's physical appearance. Nonetheless, it was a funny segment, but people don't tune into the "Late Show" to see Andy Kindler.

"THE TONIGHT SHOW WITH JAY LENO"

What is there to say about Jay Leno? He has always played second fiddle to Letterman, and the joke drought from the strike only serves to prove that point.

Drawing from the current-events pool, Leno spent the first few minutes of his monologue making jokes about politics. I have no problem with political jokes, but they cannot make up the bulk of your sketch, and that is what Leno did.

The audience responded to the tired and dry jokes with lackluster applause and laughter, and viewers at home could tell they were less than enthusiastic.

The last joke of his monologue failed so badly that afterwards Leno said, "I just wanted to prove there was a writers strike." Fittingly, the joke drew the largest response from the crowd.

Like Letterman, the main comedy for the pre-interview section of the show comes from a previously taped segment featuring a new face to the show. And also like Letterman, when there were no more jokes to be made about the presidential race, Leno turned to NBC's shows to fill time.

Leno parodied the show "Heros" and told the audience the "Tonight Show" had a special announcement to make about the new season of the show.

Leno proceeded to show a clip of an obese woman falling onto the torso of a much skinner man.

I know, I didn't get it either.

"THE COLBERT REPORT"

I am not even sure you can put the Stephen Colbert's show in the same league as the network late night shows. He is better than Conan when O'Brien has an off day, and Letterman and Leno don't even begin to compare.

One part of the show that Colbert has managed to keep fantastic is his opening monologue. Rather than relying on tired subject matter and the same segments over and over, Colbert keeps his audience guessing and always manages to blend jokes together perfectly.

Like the other shows, Colbert started having a "pre-guest" to interview in addition to the more involved segment with the main guests. Colbert generally uses the time to talk with up-and-coming movie producers or authors about their recently released work.

The other refreshing aspect of the "Colbert Report" is Colbert's dialogue with his guests. It is always topical and funny, without being too silly or over the top. His interviews are also his biggest downfall.

The only drawback to the "Report" is Colbert's attitude and the way he treats his guests. There are points in his show where he interrupts his guest, only to step back in later and steal the spotlight back.

This causes a big problem, especially when the guest is speaking passionately or on a topic they are clearly more knowledgeable about. However, this is part of the appeal of his character, which is a mockery of other larger-than-life pundits like Bill O'Reilly and Chris Matthews.

KING'S KITCHEN

Cook reveals 1st half of multiple-course Valentine's meal

The Beatles were right in singing "all you need is love," and Valentine's Day is a perfect day to express thanks and love for those who are important in one's life. In the past, I haven't made a big deal out of Valentine's Day as a matter of principle; I don't need a special day to show someone I care.

Showing love isn't about the gifts a person gives on one particular day. As a knowledgeable consumer, I never understood the point in paying upwards of $79.95 for a dozen roses when the price hits rock bottom the next day. True moments of love come about in the rare moments a couple shares together without distractions, completely focused on each other, or in little acts of kindness like waking someone up with a mug of coffee.

This year, I won't be getting my better half roses or even a box of chocolates. Instead we are going to share a romantic candle-lit dinner and a movie of her choice, just the two of us. I have been planning this menu for the last month, and I am ready to share it with you and her. This multiple-course meal will be a two-day feature concluding tomorrow.

Today's half of the menu will start off with a small stew as an appetizer, followed by the main protein. Tomorrow will cover the side dish and dessert.

BRETT KING

FILET MIGNON WITH CABERNET SAUCE

INGREDIENTS:

2 (4 ounce) filet mignon steaks
1/4 teaspoon salt, divided
1/4 teaspoon freshly ground black pepper, divided

1/8 cup minced shallots
1/2 tablespoon red wine vinegar
1 teaspoon low sodium soy sauce
1/2 cup cabernet sauvignon

1/2 cup fat-free, low sodium beef broth
1 teaspoon butter

DIRECTIONS:

With the chilly weather this time of year, one will not be able to cook over a grill, so heat a large nonstick skillet over medium high heat on an oven. While the pan is heating up, coat both sides of the steaks with 1/8 teaspoon of salt and 1/8 teaspoon of pepper. Once steaks are seasoned, cook in skillet for three minutes on each side and repeat until cooked to taste.

To keep steaks hot until dinner, put them in the oven on a warm setting. Add shallots to pan and sauté for one minute.

After one minute, stir in red wine vinegar and soy sauce.

Cook shallots and liquid for another minute or until most of the liquid is evaporated, stirring constantly. Add the remaining salt, pepper, cabernet sauvignon and beef broth; bring to a boil. When it comes to cooking with wine, only cook with a wine one would actually drink. Cheap wine can turn into cheap taste. Remove from heat and stir in butter when liquid mixture is reduced to 1/8 of a cup. Pour over the steaks evenly.

CRAB STEW

INGREDIENTS:

2 tablespoons butter
1 small onion, chopped
1 10.75-ounce can condensed cream of potato soup

1 10.75-ounce can condensed cream of celery soup
1 soup can milk
1 soup can half and half

1 pound claw crabmeat
1/4 cup dry sherry
Salt
Pepper

DIRECTIONS:

In large saucepan, over medium high heat, melt butter and sauté onion until translucent. After three to four minutes, add the soups, milk and half and half to the butter onion mixture.

Add crabmeat and bring just to a boil, then pour in sherry, salt and pepper to taste. Serve immediately.

Cycling club competes nationally, attracts several new members

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It doesn't have to be a balmy spring day for the K-State Cycling Team to be seen out and about.

The team bikes cyclocrosses (hybrid bikes) in the winter, road bikes in the spring and mountain bikes in the fall. Members tend to ride individually, but the club's president, Tyler Whetstone, said one of their goals this year is to ride more often as a group to practice for races.

"Since you're doing a lot of things by yourself, it's nice to come back and check in with other people," Whetstone, sophomore in industrial engineering, said.

The club meets at 7 p.m. every Wednesday in the K-State Student Union to make club decisions and learn more about bikes. Practices this year will consist of learning race tactics and bike-handling drills, Whetstone said.

"Everyone's welcome," he said. "If you tried the club before, try it again. A lot of cool things are happening."

Gerald Hart, senior in mechanical engineering and team member, said members compete in the North Central Collegiate Cycling Conference, which is sanctioned by USA Cycling, the national licensing and governing body for competitive cycling in the United States. K-State competes in Division I, which also includes the University of Kansas, the University of Minnesota, St. Cloud State University, Iowa State University, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, Minnesota State University-Mankato, the University of Iowa, Winona State University and the University of Minnesota-Duluth.

The first race takes place April 6 at K-State. In past years, Hart said about six to eight K-State students have competed; Whetstone said about 20 people are now interested in racing.

"It's really taken off," Hart said. "We've got a lot of people interested this year."

Members typically ride two times a week in the winter and more often in the spring and summer, Hart said. Some ride as far as 60 miles on weekends, but Hart said people can ride for only 10 miles if they don't want to go farther.

"There are a lot of beginners and a few people who are more experienced," he said. "There's a pretty wide range. A lot of people are just starting out as far as cycling."

Hart said he encouraged people to try the club because the speed, age and distance levels vary. If obtaining a bike is a concern, Hart said the club can help.

"We can help you out with getting a nice bike to try out," he said. "We have some extra bikes."

Whetstone helped bring Critical Mass to Manhattan last year, which is an evening-long bike ride for Manhattan residents and students. He said one of his personal goals is to see everyone ride a bike.

"I do my best to further the cycling community in Manhattan," Whetstone said. "Don't worry about having the right bike or going fast enough. Just [join] to hang out with cool people."

Claire Armstrong, sophomore in public health nutrition and cycling club member, said biking and being around other club members makes her feel good. She also said joining the club is a great way to find people in the cycling community to ride with.

"You learn more about your character and more about your bike," Armstrong said. "I don't know many cyclists who have started and then quit. Usually it's a lifelong thing."

Numerous embezzlement cases spur introduction of church management classes

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHILADELPHIA — The globe-trotting priest from Connecticut drove a Jaguar, shopped at Bergdorf Goodman and bought jewelry from Cartier, all of it with money stolen from his church's coffers. By the time the parish finance council caught on, he had embezzled $1.3 million.

Many U.S. churches have been victims of embezzlement over the years, reflecting not just moral weakness on the part of the wrongdoers, but lax financial controls. Often, church budgets are overseen by volunteers or employees with little guidance or professional training.

Now, some colleges are hoping to prevent such faith-shattering abuses by offering programs devoted specifically to managing church finances and personnel.

Duquesne University in Pittsburgh and Boston College started programs in September, and Villanova University outside Philadelphia is offering an online master's degree in church management beginning this summer.

The concept is becoming more popular despite some among the faithful who bristle at the notion of the church as a business, said Kerry Robinson, executive director of the National Leadership Roundtable on Church Management, a Roman Catholic group.

"It is true that the church is not a company, and we respect and acknowledge that," Robinson said. "But it is comprised of people, finances and facilities. Catholic theology demands that those are managed well — and not just well, but to the highest, exemplary degrees of stewardship."

Better financial controls might have led to an earlier uncovering of the priest sexual abuse scandal, said Charles Zech, director of Villanova's Center for the Study of Church Management. Numerous financial red flags were missed as dioceses and archdioceses quietly settled with victims and paid for treatment for priests.

More than 60 Catholic dioceses responding to a survey by Zech and a colleague reported embezzlements within the past five years. The survey got responses from only about half of those contacted, but 60 amounts to around one-third of the nation's dioceses. About a half-dozen of the dioceses that responded reported thefts of more than $500,000.

"If folks were better trained in management, a lot of problems that churches face today could have been avoided," Zech said.

Just last year, the Associated Press found reports of more than 20 churches in 17 states dealing with embezzlement cases. The cases included clergy or church employees who were either charged with, sentenced for, convicted of or pleaded guilty to stealing religious funds.

The frauds involved many denominations and included a Roman Catholic priest in Virginia who admitted stealing at least $400,000 from his parishioners and a Lutheran youth minister in Pennsylvania charged with embezzling more than $68,000.

Last fall, Boston College — a Catholic school, like

Duquesne and Villanova — began offering a master's in pastoral ministry with a concentration in church management. It also offers dual master's degrees in ministry and business.

Boston College theology professor Thomas Groome said he became convinced the programs were needed after attending a convocation of clergy and laity a few years ago.

"We were speaking two different languages," Groome said. "The business people were talking about economies of scale. The bishops and the theologians were talking about the church being a sacrament of God's reign in the world."

Jon Jakoblich, one of about nine students in Boston College's on-campus program, enrolled in hopes of landing a management role in a Catholic parish. Jakoblich, 25, said that he wants to help with strategic planning and leadership, and that this kind of education is necessary "to sustain the long-term health of the church."

At Villanova, the two-year, part-time master's program is expected to garner about two dozen applications from Catholics and Protestants alike, Zech said. So far, about half the applicants are clergy. Courses include financial reporting and controls; civil law and church law for church administrators; and personnel management.

The Rev. Frank McGrath, the new pastor at victimized St. John Roman Catholic Church in Darien, Conn., said pastors should receive some administrative training, either at seminaries or from the diocese after being ordained.

A private detective hired in 2006 to investigate McGrath's big-spending predecessor, the Rev. Michael Jude Fay, found that he had secret bank accounts and flagrantly abused church credit cards.

"Anything he wanted, he charged. And nobody stopped him for years and years and years," said investigator Vito Colucci Jr. "There was no accountability."

A second investigation ordered by the Bridgeport diocese found that the parish finance council had not met regularly in recent years, largely because of Fay's absences from the parish. Fay was diagnosed with cancer in 2001 and frequently cited his health when asked about church finances.

The diocese has since instituted stricter financial controls and appointed a dean with more than 30 years of management experience to oversee the new initiatives. The changes include an Internet-based accounting system that all 87 parishes began using last May; new financial reports; and an updated parish accounting manual.

Fay is set to report to federal prison in April to begin serving more than three years. But some parishioners were so hurt they left.

"They may never return. And their spiritual lives may never be restored," McGrath said in a statement submitted in court. "The deepest impact of Father Fay's misconduct cannot be quantified because it transcends dollars."

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

Haymaker community assistant reveals quarks, responsibilities of job

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brooke Briand, sophomore in geology, is a community assistant at Haymaker Hall. This is Briand's second year living in the residence halls, and she said she enjoys working at Haymaker's front desk as a CA. Briand said the best part about her job is meeting new people and being "in the know" about certain events that occur in the residence halls.

Q: What do you do as a community assistant in the residence halls?

A: Basically I'm here to help the residents with whatever they need: their keys to their rooms, packages, mail, any questions they have.

What's your favorite part about being a CA?

A: It's kind of fun to know more about the hall than just being a resident. I know a lot more about what's going on, a lot more about the policies ... I can explain things to people. It's fun being in the know.

It's interesting knowing things that happen at night. If something on our floor happens and you didn't know about it, you find out about it by being a CA and being at the front desk.

Q: What is the hardest part about being a CA?

A: Well, this isn't the hardest part, but I would say the most tedious is doing the mail. It's not bad; it's just very mundane, repetitive ... it gets old fast. I'm supposed to do it once a week - then we rotate on weekends. Sometimes I just go [to the mailroom] and pick up whatever is on the desk. Sometimes forwarding [mail] just gets thrown back there, and it doesn't get done.

I don't like the down time sometimes. I worked from 1 to 5 a.m. last weekend. It was hard to get through that.

Q: What does the front desk offer to the hall residents?

A: There is a lot of equipment they can check out; it's just that many people don't take advantage of it. There are games, sporting equipment, cooking stuff and weird things like a hacksaw ... in case you ever need a hacksaw.

Q: Have you had any strange experiences working at the front desk?

A: Usually not too strange, though there are some strange things that people bring up here, like wine and things like that ... There was a bra once - that was gross. There are things [residents] find in the dorm and bring them up here. They figure, "It's the front desk, just bring it up there," so there are some weird things people bring back. There was like one earring, a ring, jackets, coats, a book bag.

Q: Why did you pick a job in the dorms?

A: My sister was a CA last year, and it was a good way to get to know people - a good way to get connected in the hall. And it gives me more of a community - you know people and you get to say "hi" to them.

Q: What would you say to encourage someone to apply for

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Brooke Briand, sophomore in geology, works the front desk as a community assistant at Haymaker Hall Tuesday evening. Briand said the role of the CA is the help residents with any of their needs.

the CA position?

A: Go ahead and apply. It's a really great job, and even if you don't know if you'll be accepted, it's always good to go ahead and apply. I didn't think [I would get it], but here I am sitting at the front desk.

Q: Have you ever had to deal with an emergency situation?

A: We had to evacuate the building twice during one of my shifts for fire alarms. The first fire alarm was like two weeks after I started working at the front desk.

Q: What's the importance of having someone sitting at the front desk?

A: If you have an emergency, instead of going to find someone in your hall, you can just come down here, and we'll take care of it.

WORLD BRIEFS

AUSTRALIA APOLOGIZES FOR TREATMENT OF ABORIGINES IN THE PAST

CANBERRA, Australia - Aborigines organized breakfast barbecues in the Outback, giant TV screens went up in state capitals and schools allowed students to watch the telecast of Australia's apology Wednesday for policies that degraded its indigenous people.

In a historic parliamentary vote that supporters said would open a new chapter in race relations, lawmakers unanimously adopted Prime Minister Kevin Rudd's motion to apologize on behalf of all Australians.

"We apologize for the laws and policies of successive parliaments and governments that have inflicted profound grief, suffering and loss on these, our fellow Australians," Rudd said in Parliament, reading from the motion.

Aborigines remain the country's poorest and most disadvantaged group, and Rudd has made improving their lives one of his government's top priorities.

As part of that campaign, Aborigines were invited for the first time to give a traditional welcome Tuesday at the official opening of the Parliament session - symbolic recognition that the land on which the capital was built was taken from Aborigines without compensation.

The apology is directed at tens of thousands of Aborigines who were forcibly taken from their families as children under now-abandoned assimilation.

IF CONDEMNED, 9/11 PLANNERS COULD BE EXECUTED AT GITMO

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico - If six suspected terrorists are sentenced to death at Guantanamo Bay for the Sept. 11 attacks, U.S. Army regulations that were quietly amended two years ago open the possibility of execution by lethal injection at the military base in Cuba, experts said Tuesday.

Any executions would probably add to international outrage over Guantanamo, since capital punishment is banned in 130 countries, including the 27-nation European Union.

Conducting the executions on U.S. soil could open the way for the detainees' lawyers to go to U.S. courts to fight the death sentences. But the updated regulations make it possible for the executions to be carried out at Guantanamo.

David Sheldon, an attorney and former member of the Navy's legal corps, said an execution chamber at Guantanamo would be largely beyond the reach of U.S. courts.

"I think that's the administration's idea, to try to use Guantanamo as a base to not be under the umbrella of the federal district courts," he said. "If one is detained in North Carolina or South Carolina in a Navy brig, one could conceivably file a petition of habeas corpus and because of where they're located, invoke the jurisdiction of a federal court."

The condemned men could even be buried at Guantanamo. A Muslim section of the cemetery at Guantanamo has been dedicated by an Islamic cultural adviser, said Bruce Lloyd, spokesman for the Guantanamo Naval Station. Among those buried elsewhere at the cemetery are U.S. servicemen.

ROBBERS STEAL PAINTINGS WORTH AT LEAST $160 MILLION

ZURICH, Switzerland - Only scratches remain on the white walls where the four Impressionist masterpieces once hung. No metal detectors, no armed guards, no cameras were in sight Tuesday, underscoring just how vulnerable many of Europe's small museums are to thieves enticed by soaring art prices.

The robbers who carried out one of Europe's most dramatic art heists are likely criminals with no art expertise or understanding of how difficult it is to sell such famous paintings, experts said Tuesday. The stolen works by Cezanne, Degas, van Gogh and Monet are worth $163.2 million.

Karl-Heinz Kind, an art theft expert at Interpol, said part of the problem is the appeal of museums like the E.G. Buehrle Collection, with its accessibility and atmosphere encouraging reflection and appreciation.

"A museum or a church is not made to be a prison," Kind said in a telephone interview from Lyon, France, where Interpol has its headquarters.

"You can imagine screening luggage or clothes under machines, or X-raying them. You could imagine in churches or cathedrals to put the statues of saints behind iron bars."

Marco Cortesi of the Zurich police noted the robbery Sunday took less than three minutes, carried out by gunmen in ski masks who burst into the museum just before closing time. While one trained a pistol on museum personnel ordered to lie on the floor, two others collected the paintings and sped off with them.

Energy bill outlines guidelines, regulations

FEMA to send trailers to storm-ravaged states

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Details of the energy bill endorsed Tuesday by the Kansas House Energy and Utilities Committee:

SUNFLOWER CHANGES

The provisions are a response to the decision in October by Rod Bremby, secretary of health and environment, to deny a permit to Sunflower Electric Power Corp. for two 700-megawatt coal-fired power plants outside Holcomb.

— The secretary would be required to reconsider any permit decision made on an application submitted between Jan. 1, 2006, and the day the legislation takes effect, if that permit is still subject to administrative or judicial proceedings. Sunflower's permit application fits the description.

— The utility would have 60 days to reapply for its permit, and the secretary would have 15 days to act.

— The secretary of health and environment could not reject a permit when all requirements of the state's existing air-quality laws have been met by a utility. Such a provision would have required Bremby to approve a permit for Sunflower.

— The secretary could not impose air-quality standards that are stricter than those in federal law without going through the formal process of issuing rules, which requires public hearings and review by the attorney general and Legislature.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Power plants that burn coal, natural gas or fuel oil to run their electricity-generating turbines must capture CO<sub>2</sub> "using best technological practices." No further guidelines are included.

lines are included.

RENEWABLE ENERGY

— Utilities would be required to generate 10 percent of their electricity from renewable resources such as wind by 2010. They'd have to generate 25 percent from renewable resources by 2025.

— The Kansas Corporation Commission, which sets the utility rates, would be required to allow investor-owned utilities to earn an additional 1 percent return on their investments if they comply with the renewable energy standards. The KCC regulates their returns because they hold a monopoly within a given service territory.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

— The state would provide income tax credits to landlords who make homes, duplexes or apartments they rent more energy efficient. The tax credit would be $100 for each unit in which new insulation is installed and $300 for each rental home in which new heating or air conditioning systems are installed. Supporters expect the credits to total between $2.5 million and $3 million a year.

— Starting in 2010, fuel-efficiency standards for vehicles purchased by the state would have to be 10 percent higher than they were in 2007, if it were cost-effective.

— Office products and equipment purchased by the state, including computers, appliances, light fixtures and light bulbs, would have to meet efficiency standards set by the federal government, if energy savings made their use cost-effective.

— The Department of Administration would be required to collect data on energy consumption and costs for all property owned and leased by the state and submit a report to the 2009 Legislature. The goal is to identify locations using excessive energy.

— The state could not lease space or renew a lease on property not owned by the state unless the owners conducted an energy audit.

— The Kansas Corporation Commission would be required to increase participation by school districts and local governments in a program to make their facilities more energy efficient. The KCC would be required to "strongly encourage" state agencies to participate by Dec. 10, 2010.

— State buildings constructed after July 1, 2009, would have to meet energy-efficiency standards at least 10 percent lower than those established by the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air Conditioning Engineers. Fuel and water meters would have to meet standards set by the federal government in 2005.

— The same efficiency standards would apply, where possible, to buildings renovated after that date.

NET METERING

— The following provisions apply to utility customers who have their own solar-powered generating systems, with capacities of 100 kilowatts or less.

— For such customers, a utility must make available a program for "net metering," available if the applications for a program come from customers who consume 1 percent or more of the utility's power during a peak service hour.

— In such a program, a utility must measure how much power a customer uses against how much power that customer's solar-powered system generates. If the net figure is positive, that's what the utility would bill the customer for. If it's negative, the customer would receive a credit equal to 1.5 times the cost of the fuel not used by the utility.

ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

— Any member-owned company selling electricity to retail or whole-sale customers could exempt itself from state regulation of its rates, unless its customers file a petition with the KCC. The exemption must be approved by a cooperative's members.

STUDY COMMISSION

— A 12-member Kansas Energy Science and Technology Commission would be established.

— Its members would include the chairmen of the House and Senate utilities committees, the environment division director for the Department of Health and Environment and the executive director of the Kansas Health Policy Authority.

— The governor would appoint a climatologist and a person knowledgeable about greenhouse gas regulations.

— The House speaker would appoint a climatologist and a scientist or engineer knowledgeable about converting agricultural wastes to fuel.

— The Senate president would appoint a fossil fuels and nuclear energy expert, as well as an engineer knowledgeable about renewable energy.

— The House minority leader would appoint a scientist who's an expert on fossil fuel production.

— The Senate minority leader would appoint an expert on energy conservation.

— The commission would study scientific research about greenhouse gas emissions and recommend emissions limits.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Some of the thousands of trailers sitting unused since they were purchased by the Federal Emergency Management Agency in 2005 for Gulf Coast hurricane victims might finally be put to use — to help victims of last week's tornadoes, officials said Tuesday.

Some members of Congress have accused FEMA of playing down the danger of possible formaldehyde contamination in the trailers — 7,200 of them stored at the Hope airport — but an agency spokesman said Tuesday the trailers are safe.

The decision to use some of the trailers for Arkansas and Tennessee twister victims comes after requests by state officials and members of Arkansas' congressional delegation, who have criticized the trailers in the past as a sign of federal ineptitude after hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

David Maxwell, head of the Arkansas Department of Emergency Management, said his office told FEMA immediately after the tornadoes the victims would need some of the trailers. FEMA administrator R. David Paulson said Friday on a tour of the damage that the agency would prefer putting storm victims in rental property, though he acknowledged that could be difficult in rural communities.

"Knowing rural Arkansas and the areas that were hit, there's not a lot of rental property," Maxwell said. "Then you're stuck with mobile homes."

Maxwell said the number of trailers released would depend on the number of people that called FEMA and requested help, as opposed to simply releasing a blanket number. He said FEMA already hired a contractor to prepare and possibly move the trailers to people in need.

Tennessee state officials estimate the tornadoes destroyed 517 homes and 61 mobile homes, and estimates in Arkansas suggest about 300 homes were destroyed, likely including a number of manufactured or mobile homes.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said Tuesday his agency still hadn't reached a firm number of how many mobile homes would be used from Hope and other storage sites around the country. He said the majority of mobile homes stored at Hope were unused and in good shape, with a small percentage refurbished after being used in hurricane relief operations.

McIntyre said Arkansas and Tennessee would receive FEMA mobile homes first because they already were declared federal disaster areas. He said requests from Alabama and Kentucky were still pending.

After Katrina hit in 2005, FEMA purchased 25,000 manufactured homes built at a cost of more than $850 million. Many of them went unused while many hurricane victims remained homeless. All together, FEMA has about 75,000 trailers and mobile homes in various locations across the country.

Congress ordered FEMA to stop selling or donating the houses last year after discovering problems with formaldehyde, but McIntyre said FEMA determined its mobile homes in storage at Hope were safe to use.

The mobile homes are about 80 feet long and have two or three bedrooms, McIntyre said.

Tornadoes killed 13 people in Arkansas on Feb. 5, with 12 of them along the path of just one twister. Nationally, 59 people died in the storms across five states.

FERTILIZER | Local farmer says growing prices have no affect yet

soil are so poor, many farmers might have to.

This doesn't necessarily mean a deficit for all Kansas farmers.

Mike Bellinger, a local farmer, said the price of nitrogen fertilizer — $600 dollars a ton — has not affected his crop's yield this year. Bellinger said the price of grains has increased along with the price of fertilizer, so he is still able to make a satisfying profit. But he said he is not confident it will last. If the cost continues to increase and fertilizer prices reach $1,000 a ton, Bellinger said he might be in trouble.

"We're feeling really good right now," he said, "but just for a little while. It never stays that way."

Mengel said farmers can utilize items like animal and industrial waste as an alternative to nitrogen fertilizer, but the demand is currently so high, he said it would be almost impossible to meet the needs of all the crops with waste products.

"It's currently just a matter of low supply and high demand," said Dale Leikam, associate professor of agronomy. "It's hard to tell exactly what will happen with the pricing here into the future."

Leikam said he is still hopeful prices will level off.

"My main advice [to farmers] would be for them to contact and stay in constant communication with their suppliers," he said. "If they have not visited with their supplier about this year's needs, they need to do that probably as quickly as possible."

children and infants to keep them safe.

"Like kids," he said, "dogs are going to get into things; especially young dogs are inclined to explore and get into waste baskets and other areas they probably shouldn't be. In general, keep any products that could be potentially poisonous out of reach. ... The most important thing is just recognizing that dogs and cats are not particularly bright in knowing what they should and shouldn't ingest."

According to the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Web site, most animal poison incidents are induced from animals consuming items the owner might not know are poisonous. Some of the most common household poisons are alcoholic beverages, chocolate, coffee, onions, raisins, salt, garlic, yeast dough and macadamia nuts.

Van der Merwe said in most cases, he will advise help line callers to induce vomit-

Coach Knight remembered for championships, fiery temper

By Joe Bergkamp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During the last 50 years, many rituals have come in and out of style in college basketball.

Whether it was the slam dunk, the three-point line, shorts that went past mid-high or the resurgence of the "mid-major conference," Bob Knight served as a permanent fixture in the game of basketball. Nicknamed "The General" by ESPN analyst Dick Vitale, his actions — on and off the court — generated a love-hate relationship with basketball fans.

Knight's basketball career began at Ohio State University where he was a reserve player on a 1960 NCAA championship squad. After his playing days were over, he became the head coach for Army at age 25. In just six seasons, Knight racked up 102 victories before accepting the same position at Indiana University.

During the next 29 years, Knight's name became synonymous with the game of basketball at the collegiate, professional and Olympic level. In his time at Indiana, Knight's Hoosiers won three national championships and are still the last team to ever finish undefeated (32-0) in a season, which they did during the 1975-76 NCAA season.

Knight won a gold medal in the 1984 Summer Olympics coaching players like Michael Jordan and Patrick Ewing. Knight was also NCAA coach of the year four times, and Big Ten Conference Coach of the Year six times.

Much of Knight's coaching career success also was clouded with controversy. These incidents have served as a platform on which Knight's legacy will always be placed. Anyone who has followed college basketball can easily say that much of what Knight did in those situations was wrong, and his actions in said situations make him hard to defend. What isn't hard to defend is his flat-out ability to coach a basketball team successfully, to not only win games, but to run clean programs with high graduation rates as well. Here is a look back on the colorful career of coach Knight.

Becomes coach at Army. Compiles a 102-50 record in six seasons.

Wins first national championship with Indiana. Hoosiers go 32-0, still the last undefeated champions in NCAA.

The Indiana Hoosiers win their third — and Knight's final — national championship, beating Syracuse on a last-second jump shot by Hoosier guard Keith Smart.

In celebration of the Big Ten Conference centennial, Bob Knight is named the conference's all-time coach, and the 1975-76 Hoosier squad is named the greatest team.

Indiana president Myles Brand fires Bob Knight as coach for violating a zero-tolerance policy that might have been spearheaded by the allegations made by former student, Neil Reed. Reed accused Knight of choking him during the 1997 season.

Breaks Dean Smith's all-time victory record with No. 880 vs. New Mexico.

Knight calls it quits mid-season at Texas Tech. As it stands, Knight retired with a 902-371 all-time record.

Becomes coach at Indiana University. Compiles 661-240 record in 29 seasons.

1979 Knight is arrested for assaulting a Puerto Rican police officer during the Pan-American games in Puerto Rico.

1981 Captures second national championship with Indiana. Isaiah Thomas and the Hoosiers knock off North Carolina 63-50 in the NCAA championship game.

1985 The infamous "chair toss" in a game against the Purdue Boilermakers. Knight threw the chair in protest to a call in the game. Knight was ejected, suspended one game and placed on two-year probation by the Big Ten Conference.

1989 Knight is named both Naismith Coach of the Year and Big Ten Coach of the Year. These awards are his third and sixth, respectively.

1991 Knight is inducted into the National Basketball Hall of Fame.

1993 Reaches 600 wins with a victory over the Iowa Hawkeyes, 75-67.

1994 Unintentionally head-butts Indiana guard Sherron Wilkerson. After the next home game, Knight delivers his infamous speech directed at his critics and how he would like to one day be buried.

2001 Bob Knight is named coach of the Texas Tech Red Raiders.

Hansbrough vs. Beasley: the battle for player of the year begins

Let the debate begin.

North Carolina junior forward Tyler Hansbrough and K-State freshman forward Michael Beasley — a hypothetical clash between two of college basketball's titans — is garnering national attention.

As the season starts to wind down, topics like, "Who's the player of the year?" and, "Who's most deserving?" are thrown into high gear and plastered all over talk radio, "ESPN College GameNight" and other publications.

The following is my best attempt at starting this argument in a legitimate manner.

Who is the best? Who is more deserving? I've developed some criteria of my own, and both players grade high, but in the end only one can take home the "Kelly Williams' Player of the Year Award."

KELLY WILLIAMS

First of all, let's take a look at the cold, hard statistical facts. This is one section of criteria that no matter how you look at it, it cannot be biased. As of Monday, Michael Beasley had competed in 22 games and Tyler Hansbrough in 24. Beasley currently sits at fourth in the nation in points per game, averaging 25.2, while Hansbrough sits seven spots further down at No. 11 averaging 22.8. Hansbrough averages a whopping 10.8 rebounds per game, giving him sole position of ninth in the country, while his worthy adversary Beasley leads the nation in rebounding at 12.3 rebounds per game.

When comparing minutes played per game, field-goal percentage and free throw percentage, they all check out to be pretty even between the two. Beasley takes the cake with a higher field-goal percentage while Hansbrough shoots better from the line and plays two more minutes per game. So far, there are no glaring differences in any statistics that could decisively claim one of these two better than the other.

But, the edge in this category does have to go to Beasley. Whenever a player is able to set the school record and most likely the eventual national freshman mark in double-doubles, a certain go-ahead nod has to be given. I know Hansbrough's averaging a double-double a game too, but for Beasley to do it as freshman with the weight of the K-State basketball world on his shoulders is just amazing.

The next category in my evaluation process revolves around the teams that these two men have played throughout the year. Both Hansbrough and Beasley experienced solid nonconference opponents, and compete in two of college's best power conferences. Immediately, this part of the criteria screams at me to declare a push. But, the "Kelly Williams' Player of the Year Award" cannot be decided that easily.

By taking a closer look, one can see Hansbrough has helped his team defeat non-conference foes Davidson, BYU, Ohio State and Kentucky. In addition, North Carolina — under Hansbrough's leadership — started the season off 18-0 before suffering its first loss to Maryland, in what is always a tough Atlantic Coast Conference slate. Beasley, on the other hand, can only claim a solid out-of-conference win against California, and a non-comparable 14-4 record through 18 games.

The best win, though, by either team lies with Michael Beasley. The Wildcats, by knocking off the then-undefeated and No. 2-ranked Kansas Jayhawks, clearly had a better premiere win, while Hansbrough and North Carolina blew its chance by losing to Duke. It's still not enough though, as Beasley has not faced and succeeded against tougher competition throughout the year. Hansbrough has the edge in this one because of the amount of overall wins and better out-of-conference record, all while facing just as much defensive pressure during league play as his opponent Beasley.

The final criteria I have developed acknowledges what these players mean to their teams. It is the value factor: which player weighs more heavily on his team's ability to win a ballgame and succeed in college basketball.

Hansbrough is the driving force behind the Roy Williams-led Tar Heels. "Psycho-T," as North Carolina fans like to call him, is arguably one of the hardest working, most fearless, low-post scoring masters this game has seen in a long time. Hansbrough draws double teams at the low block like Roy Williams draws in recruits and still manages to score at will. North Carolina would not have won two overtime games against Clemson if it wasn't for Hansbrough, and they definitely wouldn't be in the top five, if it wasn't for his constant defensive and rebounding presence.

Beasley is seen by many as the basketball messiah of K-State. "The Beaz" was a high school basketball prodigy who wound up being the freshman who returned the Wildcats to national basketball relevance in one season. It is easy to say that without Beasley, the Wildcats would be fighting to stay above a losing record in Big 12 Conference play, and possibly outside the bubble picture of the NCAA Tournament. Beasley also had a large part in the win against Kansas, helping end one of the more embarrassing streaks in all of college athletics.

So, who wins in the value department? I have to go with Michael Beasley. Without him, K-State would still be struggling to succeed against superior competition. The Tar Heels, on the other hand, would still have enough surrounding talent, tradition and proven coaching ability to challenge for the ACC title and make the NCAA Tournament, even without Hansbrough. Michael Beasley is the greater asset to his team, and it becomes clear when looking at where the Wildcats currently sit in the national basketball landscape.

There you have it: the inaugural winner of the "Kelly Williams' Player of the Year Award" (if it ended today)

K-State players look to avenge only Big 12 loss to Missouri

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After falling to Missouri 77-74, in Columbia, Mo., in a game K-State led by 15 points in the first half, the Wildcats are set on making sure the game ends differently when the Tigers come to Manhattan on Saturday.

Freshman forward Michael Beasley said team members were not satisfied with their performance the last time they faced the Tigers, who were short three players because of suspension. He said the Wildcats have to improve their play and protect their home court.

"We want to win, obviously," Beasley said. "They beat us, and we had a big lead. And we don't want to lose at home; I don't think anybody wants to lose at home. That's just not acceptable."

Beasley managed 17 points against Missouri in the last contest, eight points less than his season average.

Freshman forward Bill Walker, who averages almost 16 points per game, also was held below his season average, scoring 11.

The Wildcats also struggled from the line, only converting 10 of 20 free throws. Beasley said the team is completely focused on its game at Texas Tech tonight, but once it is time for the team to prepare for Missouri, there will be extra motivation to avenge the loss in Columbia.

Freshman Jacob Pullen also said the Wildcats need to protect their home-court advantage.

He said the loss at Missouri was disheartening and to win in Manhattan, the team will have to do a better job at preserving leads.

"We lost last time, so we still have that on our conscience," Pullen said. "You know, we shouldn't have lost that game, so coming in this Saturday we're going to be more focused and try not to let the lead slip."

During the loss in Columbia, the Wildcats held a 15-point lead in the first half and entered half time with a 10-point lead. K-State's lead climbed to 14 points with 15 minutes left in the second half.

However, the Wildcats' lead slowly dissipated as they were outscored 30-43 in the second half, until the Tigers took their first lead of the game with 2:03 left. The Wildcats never were able to regain the lead.

To improve their play against the Tigers, Pullen said the team needs to penetrate the zone better and get Beasley and Walker more touches down in the post. In the loss, Beasley attempted 12 shots, and Walker attempted just eight. On the season, they average 16 and 12 shots per game, respectively.

The Wildcats did have some success down low against the Tigers in the last contest, scoring 38 points in the paint.

Pullen said the loss in Columbia was shocking, but it was a good wake-up call for the team.

"I feel like we should still be undefeated in conference," Pullen said. "But since we took that loss, it helped us out. Now we are doing well, we're just playing even better."

For Beasley, the game is simply a matter of not letting another team win in Bramlage Coliseum, something the Wildcats have not done since they fell to No. 17 Oregon in overtime 80-77 on Nov. 11, 2007.

Beasley said he does not care if he is playing one of the top teams in the Big 12 Conference or the middle school down the street — he doesn't want to let anyone come into Bramlage and win.

"We have to protect the home," Beasley said. "This is our domain; we can't just let anybody take it from us."

WILLIAMS | Beasley deserves nod over Hansbrough, should win National POY award

is indeed Michael Beasley by a score of two to one.

I know what you are thinking, though, "Kelly, you're a K-State fan, of course you're going to give it to Beasley!" I know, and I would think the same thing of a North Carolina fan. But, when you look closely and watch these two players perform regularly, Michael Beasley does not win just because of all the above reasons, but also because he is a more versatile and polished scorer than Tyler Hansbrough.

He plays hard, and just has a magnetizing effect on the ball when he wishes to rebound it. Both have the intangibles, but Beasley just has more.

Although the first award has been given out to Beasley, Hansbrough still has the remainder of the season to improve his player of the year résumé.

With one more guaranteed game against Duke, and then another possible match up with them in the ACC tourney, better things are still to come from "Psycho-T" Beasley, on the other hand, also has huge games against Kansas and Texas on the docket, with the Big 12 tourney down the road in Kansas City.

The real player of the year award picture could clear up in the upcoming weeks, or continue to be just as hazy and cloudy as it is right now.

No matter what the decision though from the real critics, this fan and writer will be content with either player taking home the honors.

They are both extremely deserving of the award, and equally enjoyable to watch play basketball. Hopefully, the two get to match up in the NCAA Tournament this year, and we can settle this debate the only way I really know how to, on the court.

Setting his own path

Andrew Wefald, graduate student in industrial and organizational psychology and visiting assistant professor of educational leadership, said he likes people to appreciate him for who he is and not for who his father is.

President's son avoids shadow of father's legacy

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dozens of K-State students occupy rows and rows of identical wooden desks in a graduate studies classroom, each listening intently to the lecturing psychology professor. One student, blending in with his fellow classmates, is discreet, trying not to draw attention to a special connection he has to the university.

His father is the K-State president.

Andrew Wefald, graduate student in industrial and organizational psychology and visiting assistant professor of educational leadership, said he almost never advertises that he is K-State President Jon Wefald's son, because he likes people who appreciate him for who he is and not for who his father is.

"Sometimes it can be strange meeting certain people when they are going to figure out who I am," Andrew said. "Academically, I don't feel that I receive special treatment because I'm the president's son. In fact, I feel a lot of pressure to do good work because of who I am — it makes me work harder."

Though he uses his family's status at the university as motivation to succeed in his graduate classes, Andrew said he did not feel any pressure to attend K-State for his undergraduate degree. Because he attended Manhattan High School and his father began his presidency in 1986, Andrew grew up in a K-State atmosphere. Anxious to get away from the Manhattan area for a while, Andrew attended Iowa State University and received his bachelor's degree in history in 1994.

Even while at Iowa State, Andrew knew he wanted to return to Manhattan, he said. After receiving his bachelor's degree, Andrew came back to Manhattan to get his master's degree from K-State in 1996. Afterward, he worked for about eight years and then enrolled at K-State again to begin working toward a doctorate in psychology. He said he began taking classes at K-State again because he has two young children and wanted to be somewhere where he had family.

Wefald teaches Senior Seminar in the leadership studies program and plans to receive his doctorate in psychology.

"I wasn't pressured to go to K-State," Andrew said. "My parents didn't care if I did — they just wanted me to do what I wanted to do. We are a huge K-State family; I grew up going to all the games and cheering on the Wildcats. My older brother attended K-State, and with my dad being here, I wanted to go somewhere else."

Man charged with raping Kansas girl fired from school job

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NORTHPORT, Ala. (AP) — A man charged with raping a 15-year-old Kansas girl that he brought to Alabama has been fired from his job as a lunchroom worker at Maxwell Elementary School in Northport, authorities said.

The Tuscaloosa County school board voted earlier this week to fire Prince Leon Knight, 37, who was charged with second-degree rape Friday after police found the teen at his mother's apartment.

Police said the girl, who had been reported missing by her parents on Jan. 28, voluntarily came to Alabama with Knight. He was described as a family friend who knew the girl since she was 5.

Sgt. Mike Chaisson said the parents arrived at 2 a.m. Saturday in Tuscaloosa to pick up their daughter.

Police spokesman Capt. Steve Anderson said Knight was once stationed at Fort Riley in Kansas while in the U.S. Army.

Knight, who was in the Tuscaloosa County Jail with bail set at $25,000, also has warrants for charges of aggravated interference with custody and contributing to child misconduct from Riley County law enforcement authorities in Kansas.

Anderson didn't know if Knight had a lawyer Tuesday afternoon.

Tuscaloosa County Schools spokesman John Merrill said Knight prepared food, cleaned the lunchroom and had little contact with students. He said when Knight was hired earlier this year, a background check didn't turn up any red flags.

Lafene offers another option for birth control

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Planning parenthood is becoming more convenient with a new birth control method called Implanon, an option that lasts up to three years and is available at Lafene Health Center.

Implanon is a plastic rod placed in a woman's arm, according to Implanon's Web site, www.Implanon-usa.com.

According to the Web site, Implanon works by preventing the ovary from releasing eggs as well as changing mucus found in the cervix. This can prevent the egg from being fertilized and is more than 99 percent effective.

"The chance of getting pregnant is less than one pregnancy per 100 women who use Implanon for one year when Implanon is inserted correctly," said Theresa Doyle, health educator at Lafene.

"Because Implanon is effective for three years, it does not require the woman to remember to take a daily pill," Doyle said. "Some women prefer Implanon because of this convenience."

The most common method of birth control among college students is the pill, she said.

Union Station closes after Starbucks loss, drop in sales

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Station Cafe, located on the first floor of the K-State Student Union, will close its doors Friday because of low sales.

Ed Coan, campus marketing manager for Chartwells Dining, said the Union Station food operations will close but the area will remain as a student lounge for studying, relaxing and eating.

"A big reason why it is closing is due to the location. The food court is on the second floor and has everything," Coan said. "There was not enough traffic and awareness of it."

Union Station offered a soup, salad and potato bar menu since August 2007 but has served different types of food for years.

After Union Station closes, employees working there will rotate into other restaurants in the food court or the Bookend Café, located in Hale Library, he said.

Union Station provided students with the same food items that could be purchased in the food court, so students are not at a loss with options of food choices, Coan said.

The kitchen and food operation systems in Union Station will not be removed and instead will be kept for possible future renovations and use.

Tina Griffin, food service director for the Union, said Caribou Coffee, Blue-mont Buffet and the food court took business from the services Union Station provided. She said many people usually bring in their own food and go there to study.

Before Caribou Coffee opened last fall, Union Station served Starbucks coffee. This fall, Starbucks moved to the Bookend Café. Sales at Union Station have decreased since the traffic went there, Griffin said.

"Over the year, there has never been a high-volume operation, and it is kind of forgotten," Griffin said.

She said she thinks the parking garage is also a reason sales might have been affected.

"After the parking garage is complete, we will possibly look at venues, but as for now, we feel it's best to close," she said.

Matt Castro | COLLEGIAN

The Union Station Cafe, located on the main floor of the K-State Student Union, will close Friday because of low sales. The area will remain open as a study lounge.

Allie Moore, senior in biology, said she was disappointed that Union Station will close but is glad the area will remain a place to study.

"It is a nice atmosphere down here; it is less busy, and you were served faster down here," Moore said.

She said since the same cuisine is served upstairs, it will not be a loss.

Stacy Pyeatt, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, said she likes to utilize the Union for studying because it is a quiet place.

She said the closing of Union Station's food offering will not bother her because she still will study there every day.

WEIRD NEWS

Radio station giving away free divorce, warns contestants it is real

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — A Charleston radio station is observing Valentine's Day with a reminder that Cupid sometimes misses his mark.

WKLC-FM, better known as Rock 105, is giving away a free divorce.

Valentine's Day isn't all hearts and flowers, said WKLC Program Director Jay Nunley. There is a darker side, he said, "where maybe you despise your spouse and resent the entire day."

Through 4 p.m. on Valentine's Day, applications for the free divorce will be accepted on the classic rock station's Web site, www.wklc.com. The winning name will be drawn at 5 p.m.

Nunley cautions that this is a real divorce and people shouldn't enter if they aren't serious.

Also, people expecting a long, drawn-out legal battle should hire a lawyer because the Rock 105 contest is for a relatively uncomplicated divorce. Charles-ton attorney Rusty Webb will handle the actual filing.

"Sure we can give away concert tickets, and we do," Nunley said. "That's going to make you happy for a little while. This is the chance to make someone happy for the rest of their life."

Boston man receives postcard from 1929

BOSTON — The message on the postcard to a "Miss Margaret McDonald" was short. Its path to the intended address was much longer. Nearly 79 years after it was sent, a postcard of Yellowstone National Park's Tower Falls arrived in a Boston mailbox recently with the one-word message, "Greetings."

Its intended recipient had long since left the Victorian house on Sparhawk Street, and the sender was not identified by name.

Michael Cioffi was shocked to find the card dated June 1929 in his mail. He says the McDonald family did own his house for generations, but he doesn't think there is anyone left in the family to pass the postcard to.

A U.S. Postal Service spokesman says it's impossible to know what happened with the card. It somehow got into the mail and was sent with a one cent stamp from Seattle earlier this year.

Funeral horses stampede, overturn hearse

LONDON — A hearse overturned when the horses pulling it to a south London cemetery stampeded, dragging the carriage and coffin past appalled relatives and sending floral tributes flying.

"It was dreadful," a mourner told the South London Press. "The horses dragged the carriage to the cemetery on its side, tossing the coffin all over the place and destroying all the flowers inside."

"Some people got very angry and had to be restrained by other mourners. . . It is understandable given the circumstances. I'm horrified that something like this could happen."

Police were called to calm angry mourners so that the funeral last month could go ahead.

The carriage appeared to have clipped a mini-roundabout as it entered Lambeth Cemetery for the funeral, the local council, which administers the graveyard, said Friday.

Speaker, workshop promote use of nonviolent communication

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Self-realization is the key to peaceful and productive relationships, said Molly Traffas, the speaker at the "Let's Talk it Out" workshop that was part of the campaign for nonviolence.

Traffas, a licensed clinical social worker, promoted compassionate communication in relationships. The Women's Center's student activist group ACTION and Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Inc., sponsored the lecture and workshop titled "Let's Talk it Out."

Leaders with the interactive relationship workshop gave the audience advice on different communication situations including learning skills, personal development, intimate relationships and even employee-to-employer communication.

Summer Allen, second-year student assistant of the Women's Center and coordinator of the event, said she thought there was a need for the campus to have a workshop introducing nonviolent communication and the skills that are necessary to achieve that.

"We basically felt like there was a need just because we'd rather be proactive than reactive in nonviolent communication," she said.

Careem Gladney, president of the Kappa Tau chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha, said the workshop was a good opportunity for his organization to get involved with new outlets.

"We always want to stay open to other opportunities," he said. "The Women's Center is a great organization, and we thought it would be a great opportunity."

Gladney, a senior in business finance, said he wanted to use the event to encourage the importance of effective communication and would like students to look at the alternatives in their choices and behaviors.

"You don't always have to follow the crowd," he said. "Definitely look within yourself and decide what is right and not always what is common."

Kyrie Graves, senior in family studies and human services, said she decided to attend the event because she wanted to learn more about being an effective listener and communicator in relationships.

Graves was one of the many audience members who came to gain tips for her own personal situations.

"Being able to communicate and listen effectively is important for everyone in their daily life," Graves said. "The ability to express your ideologies or wants and goals in a non-threatening way, is a good way to be viewed as an effective communicator and listener."

Senate to decide on funding for multiple campus groups

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five of the seven items on tonight's Student Senate agenda are allocations to individual organizations.

Senators will vote on two of the allocations while the other three will be held for referral.

KSU Habitat for Humanity requested $600 to attend a program in South Carolina to learn about other chapters of the organization. The full amount was recommended by the allocations committee, according to the agenda.

The American Humanities Student Association asked for $100 to cover travel costs for a trip to attend a conference in San Diego, Calif. The full amount was recommended.

Three allocations and one piece of legislation about additional funding for College Council are on the agenda as new legislation to be voted on next week.

Building on Breaks is an organization that promotes service trips as alternatives to traditional spring break trips. The group requested $500 to aid in paying for trips to New Orleans, La.; Dallas; Greensburg, Kan.; and LaFollette, Tenn. The full amount requested was recommended.

The Children and Adolescents Literature Community requested more than $6,000 to bring a "Wizard Rock" concert to K-State. Nearly all the money would be used to pay the six bands, four of which are in the top 10 Wizard Rock bands in the nation, according to the agenda.

Bryan Cox, chairman of the allocations committee, said the allocation to ChALC will get a little more attention because of the amount requested.

"Most people trust the allocations committee to do what's right," said Cox, junior in political science.

Of the $6,000 requested, only about $4,300 was recommended by the allocations committee.

More than $3,000 was requested by the International Coordinating Council to help organize a week of multicultural events. Only $2,218 was recommended. A majority of the money would be used for renting space.

An eighth item, a resolution regarding the ONE campaign, will be added to the agenda at the beginning of the meeting, said Charles Hawley, graduate student in sociology.

Stricter gun control needed to decrease school shootings

Nate Schmidt | COLLEGIAN

On Feb. 11, there was yet another school shooting in a U.S. high school.

It wasn't the first one of the year or even of the month, and it certainly won't be the last. According to a study by the National School Safety Center, we can expect hundreds more before the end of the year.

Why, then, are people so resistant to the idea of gun control?

Many people expected last year's shooting at Virginia Tech to trigger immediate gun-control legislation, but unfortunately, that was not the case.

Rep. Michael Capuano of Massachusetts summed up the reasoning behind this lack of action when he said tackling gun control is "just not worth it" in an interview with the Boston Globe on April 23, 2007. He also said while he would ideally like to support stricter gun-control policy, fighting a losing battle on such a divisive issue would be political suicide.

But that doesn't mean the battle shouldn't be fought. Some of this country's greatest social changes were made only after long and arduous struggles. Activists lost their lives in the fight for women's suffrage and civil rights. It took a civil war to end slavery. Change in a democracy is never easy, but it is something we must fight for.

The last time the Democrats held a majority in Congress, they made some headway on gun control. In 1994 they passed a federal ban on the sale of semi-automatic assault weapons, but this ban expired in 2004 under a Republican Congressional majority. Now that the Democrats once again have control of Congress, they should begin pushing for stricter gun-control laws.

While no amount of legislation or foresight could ever completely prevent a tragedy like the one at Virginia Tech last April or the one in Tennessee on Monday, more effective gun-control laws could at the very least make such events more difficult to execute.

Background checks should be more thorough for purchasing guns.

JESSICA HENSLEY

There should be stricter limitations on the types of weapons that are made available to the public. Such legislation might seem draconian, but it is necessary.

According to a study by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the vast majority of guns used in deadly crimes during the last decade were purchased legally.

Many conservatives might see gun-control laws as irrational and reactionary — an extreme overreaction by the bleeding-heart liberals, and many more will cite the Constitution and their Second Amendment right to bear arms.

But tougher gun-control laws are necessary, even if they are reactionary, and the Constitution occasionally can use a revision.

The law of the land must be adapted to address the issues society faces, and when so many citizens lose their lives because of gun violence every year, it is more than our right — it is our responsibility — to respond.

Real life not game about winning, money

My friends and I have found a new love for the game of "Life." For those who are unaware of the "Life" board game phenomenon, you have two options at the beginning of the game. You can begin your "life" by going to college, or by going straight into the business world. If you go to college, you immediately acquire $100,000 in debt (the game does a good job of reflecting real life), but you have a greater chance of making a bigger salary once you're finished.

I always struggle at the beginning of each game as to which way I should take my "life." Do I want to marry that little pink stick? Do I go to college for the prospect of making more money, or do I start working and make money right away, debt-free?

College — in real life — is a special time. There are so many decisions to make, so many people to meet and so much to do. Because of all these opportunities, I am tired of people telling me what it is like in the real world. What do they mean?

All my college experiences tell me that I am in the midst of real life. All my decisions and joys, and all my interactions and pains are more than some passing phase. They are very real and are constantly shaping me into the kind of person I am. Life after college will be different, and there will be more responsibilities, but if you wait to start your life in the "real world," you'll never start.

I'm getting married in a couple months, and I am not going to make money by spinning a wheel in the middle of a board. I am not really sure what I am going to be doing next year when I graduate, but I am re-evaluating what a "career" looks like.

I like the idea of people having vocations rather than careers. The Merriam-Webster dictionary defines a vocation as "a summons or strong inclination to a particular state or course of action" and a career as "a profession for which one trains." The difference between the definitions is subtle, but I think it makes all the difference in life. A person will be so much better if he or she feels strongly inclined to do something, rather than simply just training to make money.

We see this idea play out in everyday life all the time. It is obvious when people like their job, and it is equally obvious when they don't, whether it is the sacker at Dillon's or the professor of an 11:30 a.m. class. Dealing with people who love their jobs is a much more enjoyable experience than dealing with those who don't.

The only thing that bums me out in the board game "Life" (other than having a wife that is a little pink stick) is that the winner of the game is the person who comes out with the most money. Many people think that about real life too, but that's not always the case. People shouldn't get caught up in all the expectations of a prestigious and high-paying job.

Expectations placed on a person from parents, teachers and even friends can be paralyzing.

Carleton Kendrick, a doctor who has conducted parenting seminars for more than 20 years, said, "Parents who make unrealistic demands and/or have unrealistic expectations of their kids academically, or in any other sphere of their lives, risk seeing their kids' mental, emotional and physical well-being severely compromised."

Tell your parents and teachers to chill. The people who love what they do are the people who have fun and do their jobs really, really well. Attitudes like that change the world.

I'm going to ask you out one more time. Please don't do what you did the other five times and say no.

I mean, seriously. Kevin Durant's averaging almost 20 points a game. How can you say that he struggled to find his shot?

Hey, we're butterfly stomping. Get out here.

Why is it that on Valentine's Day, when you're single, all you see is couples, and when you're in a relationship, all you see is hookers?

Do you know what's sad? Hearing the amateur newspaper argue with the amateur radio station about who's worse. Really sad.

Hey, Fourum. I just saw a girl marching the Hitler march, and I'm Jewish. Should I be concerned?

I struggle balancing all my drinking, smoking and promiscuous sex. Doesn't that count for something?

To the moron frat guy who thought it'd be a good idea to wear a business suit with tan Crocs: You really need to go on "What Not to Wear." Seriously.

Drama therapy majors provide treatment through acting

By Whitney Noe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An elderly man is lying in his bed, staring aimlessly at the ceiling in his room at the Meadowlark Hills Retirement Center. His short-term memory is fading, and his long-term memory is long gone. He is a victim of Alzheimer's.

A nurse walks into his room, and she announces that he must get up and see the excitement taking place in the lobby. As they reach the lobby, seven college student performers greet him and the other Meadowlark Hills residents.

Meadowlark Hills is just one of many facilities that use company and the "healing power" of drama therapy majors like the seven college students. Drama therapy is defined as a type of psychotherapy that encourages patients to use dramatic techniques to deal with emotional and psychological problems.

K-State is one of the few universities in the United States that offers drama therapy as a major. In fact, K-State is the only school in the United States to allow students to study theater and drama therapy simultaneously at the graduate level.

Brant Wadsworth, graduate student in drama therapy, said he came to K-State for that reason. "There are two other drama therapy programs in the United States," Wadsworth said, "but they're just drama therapy; they don't have theater training and I wanted to do both, so it made my decision rather easy."

Hailey Gillespie, graduate student in drama therapy, said she had never been exposed to much theater and didn't know about K-State's drama therapy program until she took a class called Drama Therapy with Special Populations.

"The class really focused on the healing elements of drama with people with special needs, and I enjoyed it so much," Gillespie said.

It was soon after that she found out about the alternative career opportunity at K-State, she said.

"When I learned about drama therapy as a major, I wanted to do it more," Gillespie said. "It is such a healing and expressive art that there was no doubt in my mind that there was therapeutic value to it."

The drama therapy program was officially organized in 1979, but few students know about it.

There are only seven students active in the major, but they said they find it worthwhile and enlightening.

For more information about the drama therapy major or the Creative Arts Therapy Students, contact Hailey Gillespie at rudy@ksu.edu.

"A lot of times people are drawn in by expressive arts because it's so much more dynamic and much more creative than the sitting and talking type of therapies," Wadsworth said. "It is a rejuvenating experience, not just for the patients but for the therapists as well. Not a lot of people know about it, so they end up going into other fields."

To fulfill requirements in this field of study, students are obligated to complete a certain number of internship hours that provide different experiences in drama therapy. These internships can range from working at a mental hospital to teaching special-needs children or participating with a recreational team in a group home.

Renee Saltzman, graduate student in drama therapy, said she works with elementary school students who are speaking out for the children of military parents who have been deployed to Iraq. She said she uses her drama therapy skills to help children cope with their situations and give them a better

"What this program does is that it teaches us how to facilitate a lot of the healing aspects of the arts with techniques based in drama or creativity," Gillespie said.

"We do internships to help us utilize information we've learned in our classes, like how to focus in on the healing power of the process of creating or the process of performing theater or doing creative works. It's not just focused on the product you end up with — a song, or a painting or a show — but it's about getting your hands dirty, which is really a healing aspect."

IHOP prepares for 24-hour service; competition not worried about opening

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most International House of Pancakes restaurants are open 24 hours. Manhattan's is only open during the day, but that might change.

IHOP officially opened on Dec. 4, 2007, in Manhattan.

"We are very happy," said Farid Afani-Ruzik, owner and franchisee of Manhattan's IHOP. "[The opening] has been a success. We are excited to be in Manhattan."

IHOP is part of Manhattan's north end redevelopment project and is located at 101 Goodfood Place. IHOP, along with Taco Bell and Wendy's, built restaurants in the project area.

"The intent here for sure is 24 hour [service]," Afani-Ruzik said. "It takes a lot of preparation."

Afani-Ruzik said he also manages the two IHOP's in Salina, both of which are open 24 hours. He said it took a year for the first restaurant to be ready to stay open all day, and the second took only six to 10 weeks. Afani-Ruzik said he could not say for certain how long it will take for Manhattan's IHOP to stay open 24 hours.

"We concentrated on a successful opening," Afani-Ruzik said.

IHOP manager Laura Williams said she looks forward to IHOP staying open all night because she will be the overnight manager. Williams has a small child at home and a husband who works full time. Working the overnight-manager shift will save on baby-sitting expenses, Williams said.

"The customers that [IHOP employees] have talked to are looking forward to it," Williams said. "We are all excited to see what happens."

Williams said when IHOP stays open overnight, it will present a new set of challenges and new clients to serve.

Bob Iacobellis, owner of Bob's Diner, said he welcomes the competition. Any time Manhattan can create a broader tax base by bringing business into the city, it is a good thing, he said.

"I don't have any problem with [IHOP]," Iacobellis said.

Iacobellis said he would be willing to share a case of hashbrowns as a gesture of neighborly kindness, but he also said he has seen businesses come and go, and the bar rush can be a rowdy crowd if a restaurant is not prepared.

Bob's Diner has been in business for 15 years in Manhattan.

Nelson could help Chiefs' struggling receiving corp

With the NFL scouting combine less than a week away, I am beginning to wonder which college players the Kansas City Chiefs have their eyes on as potential members of their 2008 draft class.

The players participating in the camp go through various drills like the 40-yard dash, vertical jump, broad jump and 60-yard shuttle.

Three K-State football players — wide receiver Jordy Nelson, cornerback Justin McKinney and punter Tim Reyer — have been invited to participate in the combine.

The Chiefs are rumored to be fond of Nelson, but though they're close to his home, history tells us it isn't a good situation to be in.

I am a huge Chiefs fan, but I remember the last time they drafted a stud Wildcat receiver. It was 1997, and his name was Kevin Lockett.

Marty Schottenheimer fell in love with the Tulsa, Okla., native and selected him in the second round of the draft. He was a good player for the Chiefs, but his time in Arrowhead Stadium was wasted because of bad coaching decisions.

Lockett possessed excellent hands and skill, and Kansas City knew it. The only downside was the coaches didn't play Lockett until the crucial plays when they needed a first down. He succeeded by catching balls to move the chains, but teams caught on and immediately focused on Lockett when he checked into the game. Soon after, Lockett was out of Kansas City. He spent some time in Washington, Jacksonville, Fla., and in New York with the Jets, but before he knew it, he didn't have a job playing football anymore.

I'm pretty sure Nelson doesn't want that type of pro career.

The Chiefs have huge needs to fill in the offseason, and there are several other intriguing players Kansas City might have its eye on in Indianapolis.

The biggest hole on the Kansas City team is its offensive line. The Chiefs' offensive line play was brutal on the team's own quarterback last season, giving up 55 sacks to opposing teams. One of the best offensive line prospects in the draft is Michigan tackle Jake Long. At 6-foot-7 and 315 pounds, Long would be an immediate starter on the left or right side of the line for the Chiefs.

The second round pick leaves the Chiefs with a lot of options. The first question: Is Brodie Croyle the real deal at quarterback? If not, I would really like to see Kansas City take a chance on another player from Michigan — quarterback Chad Henne. Henne had a very successful career for the Wolverines and capped it off with a win over defending national champs Florida in the Capital One Bowl. If Croyle is the answer at signal-caller, then the next glaring need is a ball-hawking cornerback since Ty Law and Patrick Surtain are getting older. Patrick

Lee of Auburn would be a nice fit for Kansas City as he is a physical corner who can handle the Chiefs' defensive schemes.

The third biggest need to fill this offseason is once again at the wide receiver position. With Eddie Kennison coming to the end of his career and Samie Parker not blossoming, the Chiefs have to help Tony Gonzalez and Dwayne Bowe.

Is this where Nelson comes in? If so, let's hope he's utilized better than Lockett.

No. 17 K-State pushes past Iowa State

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMES, Iowa — K-State had to work much harder to beat Iowa State the second time around.

Kimmerly Dietz scored 18 of her 20 points in the first half, and No. 17 K-State held off Iowa State's second-half charge for a 45-42 victory Wednesday night.

The Wildcats beat Iowa State by 31 at home last month, but they weren't sure of winning this one until the Cyclones' Alison Lacey missed a shot with 6 seconds left.

The game in Manhattan was played a week after Iowa State lost starting center Nicky Wieben to a torn ACL. The Cyclones lost forward Toccara Ross to a torn ACL in December.

"This was the real Iowa State," said K-State coach Deb Patterson. "When they were in Manhattan, they were devastated emotionally. When you're blown out of the water with two injuries and on the road in the Big 12, it's really hard."

Lacey, however, didn't feel much better about keeping it close.

"I don't know what's worse, 30 points or three," she said. "I can't answer that."

K-State (17-6, 9-1 Big 12) has won 12 of 13 after a 5-5 start and is in sole possession of first place in the league. The Wildcats made eight of their first 13 shots and built a 12-point lead in the first half, then found themselves scrambling to avoid the upset.

"We were just not effective against the defense Iowa State brought to the floor," Patterson said.

Trailing 43-42 with less than two minutes remaining, Iowa State (15-8, 4-6) had two chances to take the lead.

After the Cyclones' Heather Ezell stole the ball, Lacey missed a driving shot from the right side with 52 seconds to play. K-State's Marlies Gipson misfired from the baseline at the other end and Kelsey Bolte rebounded for ISU, giving the Cyclones another chance.

Lacey drove in from the left side, but was cut off and put up a leaning shot that bounced off the rim. She then fouled Gipson, who made two free throws for the final points.

"I'd take a driving layup with her against anybody," said Iowa State coach Bill Fennelly. "You've got a driving layup going to the goal, you make it, you've got a chance to win, you miss it you lose. It comes down to that a lot of times."

Gipson finished with 12 points, including eight in the second half. Lacey's 13 points led Iowa State and Jocelyn Anderson scored 10. The Cyclones shot only 32 percent and were just 4-for-21 from three-point range.

Lacey and Ezell, the starting guards, were a combined 2-for-15 from behind the arc and 6-for-28 overall.

"We are a team, probably more so than any other, that relies on making shots," Fennelly said. "We're not going to turn you over; we're not going to maul you in the post. We've got to make some shots. We had some times when we had wide open looks at the basket and they just didn't go down."

Dietz shot 8-for-9 in the first half, including a pair of three-pointers, and outscored Iowa State 18-17. But the Cyclones shadowed her closely in the second half and she didn't get her first shot of the half until the 11:07 mark.

Her only basket of the second half came at a critical time, though, a driving shot that gave the Wildcats a 41-38 lead.

Cats fail to overcome 22-point deficit against Texas Tech

By Wendy Haun

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Junior guard Alan Voskuil was five of six from beyond the arc and scored a career-high 30 points to lead Texas Tech to an 84-75 victory over K-State, giving the Wildcats their second conference loss.

Texas Tech (13-10, 4-5 Big 12 Conference) opened the game with a 6-0 run and never relinquished the lead. K-State (17-6, 7-2 Big 12) kept it close on the play of freshman guard Jacob Pullen and freshman forward Bill Walker but was never able to get over the hump.

The Red Raiders extended the lead to 22 points with 13:54 left in the second half on a Voskuil three-point shot.

Walker, however, sparked a second-half run, scoring 16 of his 27 total points in the second half. Walker was 11 of 14 from the floor, including one of two from three-point range.

The Wildcats cut the lead to four points with 5:33 left on a three-pointer from Pullen.

However, after successive fouls from Pullen, senior guard Blake Young and Walker, Tech was able to hold off the Wildcats' run and come out victorious on a day that was proclaimed as Pat Knight Day in Lubbock, Texas.

The victory for Texas Tech was the first of Knight's career, who took over for his father, Bob, after he stepped down from the head coaching position Feb. 4.

The Wildcats have not won in the United Spirit Arena since Dec. 4, 1986. The Red Raiders now lead the all-time series against K-State, 12-11.

Walker led the Wildcats in scoring with 27 points. Freshman forward Michael Beasley logged his 20th double-double of the year, scoring 22 points and grabbing 15 rebounds. Pullen scored 16 points. The Wildcats out-rebounded Texas Tech, 33-26.

Voskuil led Texas Tech in scoring with his 30 points, as well as in rebounding, grabbing six boards.

Senior guard Martin Zeno also scored 16 and freshman guard John Robertson contributed 11.

Both K-State and Tech committed several fouls. By the end of the game, there were 50 fouls called between the teams.

Texas Tech was 25 of 36 from the foul line, while K-State was 17 of 26.

Both teams also received multiple technical fouls. Beasley was called for a technical at the 1:23 mark in the first half for running over junior forward Michael Prince after the play was whistled dead.

Both Young and Texas Tech's Esmir Rizvic received technicals with 12:12 left in the second half.

K-State will next face Missouri at 5 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

Martin clarifies 'girls' comment

USA TODAY

K-State coach Frank Martin said Tuesday that two of his players misinterpreted comments he made Saturday during the No. 22 Wildcats' 82-61 victory against Oklahoma State.

Martin said the players gave an inaccurate depiction of the remarks, and the coach apologized.

In a story in Sunday's Kansas City Star, star Michael Beasley said, "Coach jumped on us, said we have got to stop playing like girls." Added guard Jacob Pullen, "He didn't use the word girls."

In a joint statement with athletics director Tim Weiser, Martin said, "Two of my players misinterpreted my halftime comments to the team and inaccurately related those remarks to the media during a postgame news conference. I did not, nor would I ever, use any language that would be considered derogatory toward women or minorities."

"As a minority myself, I would be insulted by anyone who referred to any group in an insensitive manner," Martin is of Cuban descent.

At least two women, Andrea Wickerham, vice president of the National Center for Drug Free Sport, and Title IX expert Janet M. Justus, said they had asked the school to look into the remarks.

Kansas high school refuses female basketball official

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas activities officials are investigating a religious school's refusal to let a female referee call a boys' high school basketball game.

The Kansas State High School Activities Association said referees reported that Michelle Campbell was preparing to officiate at St. Mary's Academy near Topeka on Feb. 2 when a school official insisted that Campbell could not call the game.

The reason given, according to the referees: Campbell, as a woman, could not be put in a position of authority over boys because of the academy's beliefs.

Campbell then walked off the court along with Darin

Putthoff, the referee who was to work the game with her.

"I said, 'If Michelle has to leave, then I'm leaving with her,'" Putthoff said Wednesday. "I was disappointed that it happened to Michelle. I've never heard of anything like that."

Fred Shockey, who was getting ready to leave the gym after officiating two junior high games, said he was told there had been an emergency and was asked to stay and officiate two more games.

"When I found out what the emergency was, I said there was no way I was going to work those games," said Shockey, who spent 12 years in the Army and became a ref about three years ago. "I have been led by some of the finest women this nation has to offer, and there was no way I was going to go along with that."

Shockey noted that referees normally don't work Saturday games, but he agreed to officiate because his daughter's basketball game slated for that day was canceled.

The Activities Association said it is considering whether to take action against the private religious school. St. Mary's Academy, about 25 miles northwest of Topeka in St. Marys, Kan., is owned and operated by the Society of St. Pius X, which follows older Roman Catholic laws. The society's world leader, the late Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, was excommunicated by Pope John Paul II in the late 1980s.

Anthropology professor's experiences unlike crime TV shows

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mike Finnegan lives in the real world. While he often is called to identify a person's age, race, gender and cause of death from a stack of bones, he doesn't stomp around crime scenes in a neatly pressed suit or jump from case to case successfully.

Finnegan, professor of anthropology, is a forensic anthropologist, but he said his life is nothing like what is portrayed on shows like "CSI" and "Law and Order."

"What people see on 'CSI,' they're doing something exciting all the time," he said. "If we worked that hard, we'd be dead in six weeks. Ninety percent is pushing paper, and 10 percent is the really exciting part that makes all the paper pushing worthwhile."

When he isn't called to help excavate bones at a crime scene or identify a skeleton, which he said amounts to an average of 35-40 cases a year for states he has a contract with, Finnegan said he enjoys teaching.

"I came here primarily because of the faculty in anthropology, which is exceptional," he said. "K-State either has more of its fair share of good students, or maybe the excellent faculty brings out the good student."

Finnegan came to K-State in 1973 and has since taught classes like physical anthropology, which he described as the study of biology of humans and their interactions with other humans in a cultural context, and osteology, which is the study of bones.

Finnegan said students who are interested in forensic anthropology often do not realize there is a lot of math involved in the work. They sometimes think the job is like what they see on television.

"They don't see the Tyvek suits that are proof everything — when you're sweating to death," Finnegan said while laughing. "Safety is a big concern in a crime scene. And when you look at the bright, fluorescent lights, they're not the sexy blue lights of 'CSI.'"

"Hell, even I'd look good if the lights were blue and sexy enough."

When he's not in the classroom or helping with a case, Finnegan likes to attend art performances or go hunting. He considers 400-meter range shooting to be his specialty.

When he is traveling in areas like the Middle East and Eastern Europe, where he also does anthropology work, he likes to read British literature or fiction that features forensic anthropologists. He even has been acknowledged for helping with details in some of the fictional work.

Finnegan studied engineering in college at the University of Colorado. After working as an engineer and spending time in the Navy, he returned to school and enrolled in a physical anthropology course. Later he took a cultural anthropology course and was intrigued, eventually entering graduate school.

"As a graduate student in anthropology, I was really more interested in physiology and adaptation," he said. "Then I had a seminar in osteology. There was a 178-page book that had 15 chapters by different people with what you can do with bones."

"I started reading that book a couple of days before the first seminar meeting, and I read the whole book in one setting. It was fascinating, and I thought, 'I can do this.' So I did."

Since then Finnegan has conducted research on seven continents and excavated on five, according to his K-State biography. He said he has been in high-profile cases, though he considers all of the cases to be important because the remains he must identify mean something to the victim's family.

Finnegan said he is usually anonymous in the investigation process, but his job is rewarding and exciting when he identifies someone and the family calls to thank him.

"Teaching is rewarding in little parts on a daily basis, but this is rewarding once a year or once every other year when someone happens to take note that you did something for them," he said, "and I expect a lot of times they have no real idea of who did what."

Walk Kansas promotes state citizens to improve health through exercise

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Promoting a healthy lifestyle is the main goal of Walk Kansas.

Walk Kansas, an organization that is a part of K-State's university research and extension of health and fitness program, encourages participants to walk the equivalent of 423 miles and be mindful of healthy living. The distance from Kansas' east border to its west border is 423 miles.

"The goal of this program is to get people to become more active," said Ginny Barnard, Walk Kansas coordinator for Riley County.

These 423 miles can be done through biking, walking, swimming or a combination of multiple activities to complete the miles. Even gardening, weight lifting and any types of physical activity can fulfill the requirement toward the miles.

Sharolyn Jackson, state coordinator of Walk Kansas, said the registration deadline for each county is different. However, most counties will take registrations until March 7. The fee also varies from county to county but is about $5 throughout the state. Participants receive a T-shirt, and attend a celebration after completion of the program.

The program consists of teams of six, with the members of the team completing a total of 423 miles during an eight-week period. Each team has a captain who records the team members' miles each week and then turns them into the county office. This also can be done online or by phone.

Walk Kansas is open to everyone through K-State Research and Extension. Most counties in Kansas participate in this program. This year 101 out of 105 counties are participating in Walk Kansas.

"The majority of participants are between 30-50 years old, but we do have quite a few college students," Barnard said. "Last year, more college students than normal participated, and the number for both college students and community members involved in the organization grows each

Participants said they like the program for different reasons.

Research director aims to clarify stance in 'Big Tobacco' Collegian column

Editor,

I am writing in regard to Joe Vossen's opinion piece "Colleges should accept money donated by Big Tobacco."

I agree with its main point, and my quotations were accurately and fairly used, but Mr. Vossen used only my comments directly relevant to his conclusion that university administrations should not ban such funding.

I expressed several other opinions that I would like to share.

I made clear that I am personally negative about such funding, and that neither the Johnson Cancer Center nor (to the best of my knowledge) its affiliated scientists have ever accepted awards from big tobacco.

I also noted that the cancer center had indeed been offered such funding in another context — to organize a symposium on campus under our name.

It would have provided them an opportunity to choose speakers who were sympathetic to their attempts to manipulate public opinion.

About 30 percent of cancer deaths are because of the use of tobacco products, and part of our mission involves promoting public awareness of these dangers. We immediately refused their offer.

During her two days at K-State, Lule was most generous with her time, meeting informally with interested students and faculty and speaking to classes in addi-

We were glad to see that you devoted your Tuesday editorial to the HIV/AIDS issue. Keep up the good work.

WORLD BRIEFS

DANISH NEWSPAPERS REPRINT CONTROVERSIAL
MUHAMMAD CARTOON

COPENHAGEN, Denmark — Danish newspapers reprinted cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad in a gesture of solidarity Wednesday after police revealed a plot to kill the creator of the caricature that sparked deadly riots in the Muslim world.

Danish Muslims said they would seek to avoid a repeat of the violence two years ago — but with a rightwing Dutch lawmaker planning to air a movie that condemns Islam as fascist, Europe pondered the possibility of a new cycle of turmoil.

"I just don't want to go through this again," said Mohammed Shafiq of the Ramadhan Foundation, a Muslim educational group in London. Shafiq said he has written a protest letter to the Danish ambassador in London.

Other Muslim groups echoed his sentiments, saying they believed the Danish papers were seeking unnecessarily to rekindle the fiery debate over free speech and Islam that engulfed Europe during the uproar over the cartoons in 2006.

Some experts said that discussion never went away — it just drifted off the editorial pages of Europe's dailies.

"This conflict will remain as long as there are people who believe religion should have a greater role in society," said Magnus Norell, a Middle East expert at the Swedish Defense Research Agency.

The drawing, by newspaper cartoonist Kurt Westergaard, depicts Islam's prophet wearing a turban shaped like a bomb with a lit fuse.

IRANIAN BODY REINSTATES SOME CANDIDATES EARLIER BANNED FROM RUNNING IN ELECTIONS

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran's hard-line constitutional watchdog said Wednesday it has reinstated more than 280 candidates for parliament races next month, but reformists said many remain banned and the move is not enough to ensure a fair election.

The Guardian Council's reversal came amid growing criticism by both reformists and conservatives that a wide ban on eligible candidates would risk a low election turnout and undermine the polling.

The disqualification of reformist candidates removed a big challenge to hard-liners vying for parliament seats. The elections are seen as a key test of hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's hold on power and a harbinger for the 2009 presidential election.

Those reinstated include the grandson of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, founder of Iran's Islamic republic. Ali Eshraghi had been among hundreds excluded for allegedly not being loyal enough to the principles of the 1979 Islamic revolution and hard-line interpretations of Islamic rule. But reformists said the reinstatements didn't go far enough.

"It doesn't change anything. The reversal for reformists is too little to create the fewest conditions for a free and fair election," said reformist leader Saeed Shariati.

Esmail Gerami Moghaddam, spokesman for the reformist National Confidence Party, said only 25 of those reinstated were considered reformers.

WTO CONDEMNS CHINA FOR FIRST TIME, SIDES WITH U.S., EU, CANADA ON AUTO PARTS

GENEVA — The World Trade Organization on Wednesday issued its first official condemnation of Chinese commercial practices, siding with the United States, the European Union and Canada in a dispute over car parts.

The WTO found that China was breaking trade rules by taxing imports of auto parts at the same rate as foreign-made finished cars, according to a copy of the ruling's conclusions obtained by the Associated Press.

In the sweeping decision, the three-member WTO panel found against China on nearly every point of contention with the U.S., the 27-nation EU and Canada. The panel found that Chinese measures "accord imported auto parts less favorable treatment than like domestic auto parts" or "subject imported auto parts to an internal charge in excess of that applied to like domestic auto parts."

Its final message to Beijing: "The dispute settlement body requests China to bring these inconsistent measures as listed above into conformity with its obligations."

Bill's former campaign chief backs Obama for presidency

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Ohio — The man who served as national manager of former President Clinton's 1992 campaign endorsed Sen. Barack Obama on Wednesday. David Wilhelm, who led the campaign and later became chairman of the Democratic National Committee, said Obama had the unique ability to encourage cooperation as a 65-percent president after the divisive years of a 51-percent majority. He was referring to the notion that Obama could govern the country with the support of a large coalition, as opposed to more polarized support for President Bush.

OBAMA

Wilhelm is a superdelegate who was previously uncommitted in the race. His endorsement helps Obama in the race for delegates, in which he pulled ahead after Tuesday's sweeps of primaries in Virginia, Maryland and the District of Columbia. Clinton remains considerably ahead in superdelegates, which are party officials, elected officials and others who can vote however they choose at the nominating convention.

If the race for pledged delegates based on outcomes in caucuses and primaries across the country remains tight, superdelegates could decide the nomination.

Obama leads the delegate race with 1,275 to 1,220 to Clinton, according to the latest count by The Associated Press.

Persuading superdelegates to back Obama will be a crucial role for Wilhelm in the Obama campaign, Wilhelm said.

"The only reason this race appears to be closer than it actually is is the number of superdelegates that bought into Senator Clinton's inevitability early — too early, it seems," he said.

The Clinton campaign predicted Wednesday it would be in a virtual tie with Obama in delegates after March 4 primaries in Ohio, Texas, Vermont and Rhode Island, separated by no more than 25 delegates.

Wilhelm said the Democrats could never win a contest about experience over Sen. John McCain, the likely Republican nominee, but could win — with Obama — an election that was framed around change.

McCain rallies House GOP members behind him, looks toward election

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Republican nominee-in-waiting John McCain appealed to GOP House members for help rallying conservatives behind him, acknowledging the party must unite if it hopes to match the enthusiasm generated by Democrats Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

MCCAIN

McCain met Wednesday with House Republicans in an effort to smooth over past conflicts and encourage critics to back his candidacy. McCain, all but assured the nomination, won Tuesday's primaries in Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia.

"I'm very gratified by the very warm reception that I received from the Republican conference this morning — a spirited and a good discussion of some of the issues," McCain told reporters afterward. "I'm very grateful for our pledge to work together."

McCain spoke at a Capitol Hill news conference where he was flanked by the House GOP leadership. The Arizona senator is working hard to reassure critics who are suspicious of his more moderate positions on some issues and of his tendency to work with Democrats.

Republican leader John Boehner, for one, was willing to set aside differences.

"Clearly, I've had some disagreements with Senator McCain over the years," said Boehner, an Ohio congressman. "But I've got to tell you, I've watched this presidential race unfold, and I've watched John McCain be a strong advocate for the principles I believe in."

GOP whip Roy Blunt called McCain "the best possible nominee for us to take back the House."

"The nominee who appeals to Reagan Democrats, the nominee who appeals to independents, the nominee who will unite conservatives in a way that assures he'll be not only the next president, but he'll be working with a Republican majority in the House," Blunt said.

Republican retirements from Congress diminish the GOP's chances of recapturing control of the House and Senate in November.

McCain promised to work hard to elect Republicans to the House, and allowed the Democrats have generated more enthusiasm among voters to date.

Complicating his task is Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who has stubbornly refused to leave the Republican race despite the seeming impossibility of overcoming McCain's commanding lead in the chase for convention delegates.

"Of course, I would like for him to withdraw today; it would be much easier," McCain said. "But I respect his right to remain in this race for just as long as he wants to."

Huckabee gave McCain big trouble Tuesday among conservatives in Virginia. There, exit polls showed 63 percent of white, born-again Christians supported Huckabee.

Even so, McCain noted, he won Virginia by more than 9 percent.

"In any election I've ever been involved in, a 9 percent cushion is very good," McCain said. "I also understand why many evangelical Christians would vote for Governor Huckabee. He is a Baptist minister."

As he did Tuesday night, McCain focused much of his criticism on Obama, Tuesday's winner on the Democratic side.

"I respect him and the campaign that he has run, but there's going to come a time when we have to get into specifics," McCain told reporters Wednesday on Capitol Hill. "I've not observed every speech he's given, obviously, but they are singularly lacking in specifics."

WEFALD | Son returns to university to be closer to family, earn degree

Wefald, said he decided to come to K-State because his family only lived in Manhattan for a couple of years before he began college and he began attending fraternity recruitment events. Skip became a member of Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity and received his bachelor's and master's degrees in history from K-State.

Skip, who now works in sales at Steel and Pipe Supply, said his K-State experience did not differ from that of a student whose father was not the president.

"People were interested that I was the president's son for about five minutes," Skip said. "There was no impact in terms of how people looked at me or how professors treated me. I never tried to use my dad's presidency to my advantage."

President Jon Wefald agreed that his sons never publicized his position while in school.

"They never tried to pretend they were anybody other than themselves," President Wefald said. "No one even knew their dad was the president. They were very humble, ordinary young people the whole time they were here. My wife and I were always pleased with them. They both loved going to class and did their duties."

Along with working toward his doctorate, Andrew helps teach Senior Seminar in Leadership, a core class in the leadership studies minor, and Small Business Consulting in the management department.

Andrew said he plans to finish his two-year contract with Leadership Studies and Programs and receive his doctorate in psychology. He said he enjoys what he is doing at K-State right now, and he also said he plans to stay in academics and become a professor.

"I really like the graduate and leadership studies programs I'm in right now," Andrew said. "Being a graduate student and assistant professor at K-State has been one of the best experiences of my life. It's both awesome and challenging."

Andrew said having his father as president of K-State has some perks, which give him a slightly different K-State experience than most students.

"My experience at this school is probably somewhat weirder than a student's whose father is not the president of K-State," Andrew said. "It's nice and can be privileged though. I get to do a lot of stuff that other students don't get to do, like meet coaches, players and Landon Lecturers, which is really cool."

Andrew said K-State serves as a huge connection to his family. He said his father's position allows him to talk to his father every day, and one of his favorite aspects of living in Manhattan is being in the same place as his parents. Andrew's wife, along with his brother and his brother's wife, also received their bachelor's and master's degrees from K-State.

"My entire family has such a strong connection to K-State," Andrew said. "I love K-State - this is my home. I feel like this university is such a huge part of my family, and because of that, I love being around here."

"I feel like I have a different connection to this school since I've grown up here, been a student here and have parents that work here. I've been a part of K-State for 20 years."

IMPLANON | Birth-control device to cost several hundred dollars

method for people who think they'd have trouble remembering to take a pill every day," said Annisa Shockey, president of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and senior in biology.

Interested women can receive Implanon from Lafene or the Women's Health Group in Manhattan for $700 for placement of the rod and $150 for removal at Lafene.

Many insurance companies do cover Implanon, but women without insurance can get reduced rates at the health department, Doyle said.

Women should have an annual well-woman exam regardless of whether they are using birth control, Doyle said. The exam includes a breast and pelvic exam as well as an opportunity to provide information to the patient like asking about birth control or answering any further questions the patient might have, said Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion.

Implanon might be less effective in women who are severely overweight or are taking certain types of medications, Doyle said.

"Implanon must be removed by the end of the third year and may be replaced with a new Implanon," Doyle said.

According to the Implanon's Web site, the most common side effect of using this method is bleeding. Other effects which could result from insertion and are temporary are pain, swelling, bruising, scarring and expulsion of the implant, which rarely occurs.

"Each woman should discuss with her provider which method of birth control would work best for her," Doyle said.

"Implanon, as well as other types of birth control, will not protect against STDs," Doyle said. "Condoms, if used correctly, can help protect against STDs, as well as adding extra birth control protection."

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

Columnist
answers tip inquiriesWhere's a good place to leave the tip at a bar?

The tip jar. The simplicity of it is mind-boggling. But I understand what you mean.

You want the bartender to know you tipped them; otherwise they get moody. But how do you get their attention without succumbing to jumping up and down, waving your dollar, yelling, "Hey, fat head, here's your buck?"

ADAM

Origami. My friend Liz likes to make a crab out of her dollar, complete with one giant pincher and air foils, so when you blow it head-on, it fades to the side. Now, she's only managed to pull it off once. And how wonderful that was. It was like "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang" all over again. Glorious. Her repeated attempts at recreating this masterpiece have been futile, however. But often the act of trying will get the bartender's attention; plus, it's a good conversation starter if they're not too busy.

If you've been there a while and the bartender has been extra kind, try to recreate the string-puppets from "The Sound of Music." Get them dancing around with their gangly legs and start belting out "The Lonely Goatherd" with a "Lay ee odl lay ee odl lay hee hoo." Who wouldn't turn and watch that? Then just dance the puppet on over the bar, and mission accomplished.

Why does school suck?

I love this question. Because it's school.

Personally, I really enjoy school. I enjoy going to class, though that doesn't coincide with the fact that I skip class from time to time (to time to time to time ...). As soon as I learned about opportunity cost in economics, it all went downhill. Suddenly I had justification for skipping class — my time would be better spent in bed.

School can be so repetitious. We go there every day and sit for hours. Sometimes we learn things; sometimes we don't. Teachers need to understand that some of the lessons they have to give just aren't that interesting.

Then you have all these required classes that are utterly useless. Case in point: Engineering Concepts. Dumb. Of course that was four years ago, so things might have changed by now (doubt it). We listened to guest speakers, built crappy balsa wood towers and gave even crappier presentations about them. Waste of time. All I learned was that balsa wood sucks.

As I'm in my fifth year of college, I've had many 500- and 600-level classes. I've taken several tests in these classes. I've gotten many 20 and 30 percents on these tests, and yet I've still pulled B's and sometimes A's. Why? Because the class had an outrageous curve. Don't get me wrong, God bless the curve. But what is the point of having a class where either the teacher isn't teaching anything or the students aren't learning anything? Yeah, I got a B in Foundations of Analysis — couldn't tell you a thing about it. What's that, you took Stats 510? Yup. Learn anything? Nope.

I really do like school though. I've had a handful of teachers who I have learned a lot from in and out of class. One even taught me how to season salmon for a lovely girl. So school's not all that bad. It's how I met you, isn't it?

Happy Valentine's Day, beautiful.

Stores offer quick, affordable V-Day gifts

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Valentine's Day has arrived, and people are running around at the last minute to find the perfect gifts. Manhattan businesses have several ideas to help the late shopper.

Acme Gift in Aggieville has a variety of wacky items to purchase. Diane Meredith, co-owner of Acme Gift, said there are several fun toys, books or games.

"One popular item we have that people have been purchasing is the toilet paper with lips, and we have fun books that are best sellers," Meredith said.

Aside from the small, silly items to incorporate with gifts, Acme Gift also offer flowers.

With the phone ringing more often this season, Meredith said Acme keeps going when other flower shops close early. Acme Gift allows customers to customize their own floral arrangements. She said sometimes employees create unusual arrangements for their customers.

"Watching guys come in is hilarious because they have no clue what to do, so we give them a series of questions to drag information out of them to get the right flowers," Meredith said. "We let them pick out everything, down to the last flower."

Acme Gift also makes orders for men incorporating masculine items. She said she once made an arrangement of flowers with a six-pack of beer.

Acme Gift offers affordable arrangements and gag gifts, and the company can deliver gifts around campus or Aggieville for free or anywhere in town for $4.50.

If people want to add candy to a gift, Candyopolis, located in the Manhattan Town Center, provides an assortment of candies from which to choose.

Courtney Harken, Candyopolis employee and freshman in pre-professional business administration, said the store has candy boxes to fill with candy, plush animals, balloons and novelty items.

"We cater to the customers and give them whatever they need, and we do it with the customer in mind," Harken said.

Whitney Wilson, Candyopolis employee and senior in apparel and textiles, said they have seen a lot of last-minute shoppers in the store.

Customers can put together bags of candy, or there are pre-made candy bags available. She said the store also makes candy bouquets, which can be made with any candy available in the store.

"Everyone loves candy, and we have a whole bunch of stuff, so that is why people come in at the last minute," Wilson said.

LAST-MINUTE
GIFTS:

Make a personalized card instead of buying one. Handmade cards are always more sentimental, and they are easy to make.

Make mixed CDs of your significant other's favorite songs or songs which remind you of him or her.

Handmade picture frames, scrapbooks or collages are always special. Mod Podge can be your best friend while making picture frames.

Make a series of love coupons for free back rubs, homemade dinners or whatever you choose, and give them to your significant other.

Make your significant other's favorite dinner or dessert.

Make a basket filled with your love's favorite items. You could fill a small basket with favorite candies, snacks and a movie.

Leave a series of Post-it notes in your significant other's belongings to let them know you care.

KING'S KITCHEN

Cook finishes Valentine's meal with side, dessert

Unfortunately, a meal is not complete without a side dish and dessert. It isn't exactly required, but it just seems to complete the meal. Before I finish my Valentine's Day menu with the rest of the recipes, I would like to talk a little bit about the wine selection. If one wants to purchase only a bottle of wine, I would consider a dark dry red wine like merlot or cabernet sauvignon. A bottle of blush could be acceptable if the person does not like red wine.

Though this meal is for someone I care about, I am the one who is cooking, so I get to have my favorite pairing with red meat: mashed potatoes.

Chocolate has always been a staple of Valentine's Day, which is why I chose to create chocolate dipped strawberries with drizzled white chocolate. Many believe they are difficult to create, when in actuality it is just time-consuming.

GARLIC SHALLOT MASHED POTATOES WITH THYME

8 red potatoes, peeled and quartered
1/4 teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons heavy cream
1 tablespoon butter
1 tablespoon milk
1 clove of garlic, minced
2 shallots, diced
1/2 tablespoon thyme
Salt
Pepper

Bring to a boil. Once water is boiling, reduce heat to simmer and cover for 15 to 20 minutes. To tell when the potatoes are done, poke with a fork to see if it can easily go through them.

Drain water from potatoes and place into a large bowl, then add cream and melted butter. Use a potato masher to reduce the size of the potato chunks.

Once a thinner consistency is achieved, beat with a hand mixer or strong spoon. Adding more milk will make the potatoes thinner in consistency. Add garlic, shallots and thyme to finish off the process.

Be careful not to overbeat the potatoes because they will become gluey. Use salt and pepper to acquire the desired taste.

CHOCOLATE COVERED STRAWBERRIES

2 pints of strawberries
1 bag semisweet chocolate chip morsels
1/4 cup half and half cream
6 ounces white chocolate chip morsels

Wash strawberries by running cool water over the top, then pat dry with paper towel. Take two sauce pans and fill halfway with water. Once saucepans are filled with water, place on burners on medium-high heat. Place a glass bowl on top of each saucepan to create a double boiler.

Melt chocolate chips in one double boiler and the white chocolate in the other. Add the half and half cream to the semisweet chocolate once it's melted.

Once melted, dip strawberries in the regular chocolate and place on a cookie sheet lined with wax paper. After pan is full, take a spoon and dip into melted white chocolate and drizzle thinly over the top of strawberries.

Place in refrigerator until chocolate is hard and set.

Military vote changes as war in Iraq prolongs

By Rebecca Perez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This is the final article in a five-week series examining the voting behavior of different groups within society and their effects on the 2008 presidential election. Check the Collegian Web site, www.kstatecollegian.com, for previous articles.

Many military service members say they vote for Republican candidates for three simple reasons: they are traditionally pro-gun rights, pro-death penalty and pro-military.

Dale Herspring, professor of political science and author of multiple books on the military and politics, said Democrats began alienating service members in the 1960s and the height of the Vietnam era.

"The military hated Lyndon Johnson because of the way he interfered in the Vietnam War," Herspring said. "When it came to Johnson and Robert McNamara (his secretary of defense), they acted in ways that were guaranteed to upset the military."

Many soldiers can trace their political affiliations with the Republican Party to President Ronald Reagan.

"When Jimmy Carter ran for reelection against Reagan, less than 1 percent of military officers voted for him," Herspring said. "They were so turned off by the way Carter had treated the military [in spite of being a graduate of the US Naval Academy], and so impressed by the way Reagan treated them, that they moved into the Republican camp."

This election season has seen a change in military voting patterns. Based on financial contributions and polls, military members are showing more support toward anti-war candidates.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, individuals in the Army, Navy and Air Force were top contributors for anti-war presidential candidates last year. Rep. Ron Paul, R-Texas, who opposes U.S. involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan, was the top recipient of money from donors in the military, collecting at least $212,000 from them. Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, another war opponent, was second with approximately $94,000.

Military approval ratings are down for the war in Iraq according to a Military Times poll at www.militarytimes.com. Only 62 percent of military members polled have some degree of optimism that the war in Iraq will succeed, which is down from a high of 83 percent in 2004. Thirty-seven percent of military members polled believe the war in Iraq will take longer than 10 years.

Andre America Sr., a 47-year-old retired Air Force airman and K-State student, is an Obama supporter and said that he would have to think about voting for Sen. Hillary Clinton if she gets the Democratic nomination.

"The way the Clintons' campaign has been conducted - the way they treated Obama - I don't think it was right, but as a Democrat, I would probably support the Democratic ticket," America said.

"I think a majority of the military people I ran across voted Republican because they thought that the Republicans were better on national defense than the Democrats, especially when I came in during the Reagan era," America said. "That was the predominant view, but it really started to change with the war in Iraq."

America said it is crucial to move U.S. soldiers out of Iraq with honor and diplomacy.

"It was very interesting to watch Fox News and all of the gung-ho troops, but the troops that were coming back from Iraq that I helped out were all saying that we need to get out of Iraq," America said. "It was a different point of view, but you never heard that point of view because of the military. You had to toe that line of supporting the commander-in-chief and not really saying anything against the government. But many of us that were retiring heard the troops say we need to get out, but in an honorable way."

Upcoming career fairs allow students to market themselves

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Career Fairs can be critical tools for job searches; however, students can sometimes become overwhelmed with the large number of employers and little time to spend with them.

Dottie Evans, assistant director of K-State Career and Employment Services said every student should have a 60-second commercial promoting themselves to the employer and effectively making use of their time.

"Your introduction is very important," she said. "You need to say your name, major, year and articulate the opportunity you are looking for whether it be a job or internship. Students need to keep in mind that they have 5-7 minutes max per employer."

In this commercial, students should make their objectives clear and give the employer a connection.

"The employer needs to know what you have to offer their company, and the student needs to know what the employer can offer them," she said.

She also said it is crucial for students to conduct research before the fair on 5-8 employers in which they are interested. Students should then pull 3-5 questions to keep conversation going once they have introduced themselves to the employer. It is also important for students to make sure they have a supply of résumés on hand. Evans said students should bring at least 20 copies.

"Recruiters will pull students aside who have the major on their name tag that they are looking for - so they need to be prepared," she said.

She also said some employers stay in Manhattan an extra day after the fair and use the next day to conduct interviews.

Evans recommended students should start attending career fairs starting their sophomore year.

"Employers want to see students as early in their college career as possible," Evans said. "It is important to build these relationships - and this does not happen over one account."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Students browse for prospective employers at the Engineering Career Fair. The Business and Hospitality Career Fair is scheduled for February 9 and the Common Good Internship/Career Fair is March 5.

The more a student visits an employer at career fairs, the more likely they can make a strong impression and possibly land an internship or job, she said. It is also important for students to make sure they send a thank-you note to employers of interest after the fair.

Monday there will be a Business and Hospitality Career Fair and other colleges will follow. Evans said the career fairs are just one service that CES has been providing for years. They also provide résumé critiques, mock interviews and other services.

Board rejects tuition cap

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a three-hour meeting Wednesday afternoon, the Kansas Board of Regents voted 7-2 against the creation of a tuition cap.

Regent Jill Docking of Wichita presented the official motion, or decision, that was approved by the board. Kip Peterson, Board of Regents' director for government relations and communications, provided an exact quoting of the motion.

"I move that the Board of Regents make clear its concern over the continuing rise in tuition and offer guidance to the universities that near term increases in tuition will be well below those of the recent past," Docking said at the meeting Wednesday.

The purpose of the final motion was to avoid creating a cap while still finding a way to ensure that tuition prices do not increase by such a great percentage as they have in previous years.

"The point we have all made as regents is that it is now time to take into consideration that there were very large increases in tuition in the last five to six years. It is time to change that pattern," Docking said. "All of the regents agree on that."

Peterson said the decision to alter the pattern of drastic increases in tuition began last month. Members recently inducted to the board expressed concern in schooling costs and requested steps be taken to generate a change.

"A number of the members raised some concerns

Common STD increases risk of oral cancer in men

By Kristin Hodges

A sexually transmitted disease is increasingly becoming a risk factor for oral cancer in men, according to a recent study.

According to a Feb. 1 article in the Washington Times, a study released by the Journal of Clinical Oncology reported that cases of human papillomavirus-related oral cancers have been on the rise since 2000.

Researchers from the National Cancer Institute and Johns Hopkins University found that though tobacco and alcohol consumption were the leading risks for oral cancer in the past, these risks are declining and HPV-related risks are rising, according to the article. The researchers found that men were more likely than women to have HPV-related oral

Student body VP still only to apply; deadline today

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The deadline for those filing for student body president and vice president for the 2008-2009 school year is 4 p.m. today.

Still only one pair has filed: Lydia Peele, senior in mathematics education and Robert Swift, junior in political science.

Peele said she's hopeful competitors will file before deadline.

"Friday is usually a busy day," said Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator for student activities and services. "A lot of people file for all the races. It's not unusual to have a president and vice president file on Friday, so it won't surprise me at all if somebody does."

The following is a Q&A with Lydia Peele:

How do you feel about running uncontested?

Well, since the deadline isn't until four, I haven't been sitting too comfortably with that concept. You never know what's going to happen. As far as our campaign, we've been talking about both possibilities, like what we would do if nobody else decided to file or if somebody else did and different ways we'd go about things. I guess we'll just wait till tomorrow for now.

Robert and I still really want to visit with a lot of students and a lot of student organizations to get our ideas out there and see what students think about them. So far we've received really good feedback but we really want to make sure that we're doing what students need and what they want. If there's anything else we can do, we can definitely work on that as well because that's what we want to do — we want to serve the students.

Are you hopeful for some competition?

I am hopeful for the competition. I think it's necessary to the process. We have elections for a reason. We usually have about four or five pairs who run.

You have to do your research and be prepared to debate and answer questions. We've been preparing for all that with the idea that there will be other people running. So we are hopeful for that competition and also to see what other ideas are out there.

What is the primary issue your administration will address if elected?

I think the biggest issue right now is taking a look at Lafene Health Center, using a comprehensive survey of everybody who uses the center, whether it's the pharmacy or the women's clinic.

From there, we would like to work with the university health center director or someone on the outside who has a lot of expertise in the field of health care and find out how we can make our services better for students.

How will you advertise your campaign if no one runs against you?

We might put a few small things up, just so people know what our ideas are and know that the elections are coming up. We never planned on blanketing campus in the first place. We definitely don't want to have as many posters up. We don't want to waste people's time and taking up tree space and all that. We have our T-shirts all ready, so we'll be distributing those as well until they run out.

What part will student body president Matt Wagner play in your presidency?

I think if we win the election, I would probably call him from time to time to get his advice. We have worked really closely together this year, but at the same time president and vice president are two very different roles. There are different committees to serve on as chairs, different sorts of relationships to have with the administration and the Board of Regents. Working so closely with him makes it easier for me to be able to give him a call and ask him [for advice].

What is your most valuable experience as vice president?

I think as far as preparing me to be student body president would be the relationships I've formed with the administrators. We're really lucky here at K-State to have administrators and faculty and staff that are really supportive.

I've been really grateful for that this year and I look forward to being able to continue to build those relationships next year. I think it would be to our advantage and it probably wouldn't take so long for me to just jump right in because I know what I'm getting into.

Riley County man charged with murder

Staff report
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department charged a 49-year-old Leonardville, Kan., man with second-degree murder Thursday.

According to a police report, Howard Barrett, of Leonardville, called police from his apartment at about 10:30 a.m. Thursday to tell officers he needed an ambulance and that he had injured someone. When officers arrived at Barrett's apartment, they found the body of a 48-year-old Clay Center, Kan., man.

Barrett's bond was set at $50,000, according to the report.

Senate to revise, reconsider bill to increase Union salaries

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate sent a bill back, which would have increased the K-State Student Union Operations Budget Privilege Fee by about $20,000 for fiscal year 2009 and $32,000 for the fiscal year of 2010, to be revised after it was rejected 34-11-8.

The increase is intended to make up for campus-wide minimum wage increases.

Tim Weninger, faculty senate representative and graduate student in computer science, argued the increase in minimum wage would mean an increase in all workers' pay, not just those who would be making under the minimum. This, he said, would conflict with the system other areas of campus have utilized and has caused displeasure with several campus workers.

The bill was sent back to the privilege fee committee for reconsideration after a unanimous motion.

James Lyall, associate vice provost of information services, gave a demonstration on the workings of a new e-mail system, which could potentially replace K-State's WebMail. The new system has numerous features including schedule sharing and instant message capabilities.

Three students were appointed as senators to serve for the remainder of the 2007-2008 fiscal year. John Porter, junior in mechanical engineering, will represent the college of engineering. Addison Kirkland and Christine Caplinger, sophomores in family studies and human services, will represent the college of human ecology. This resolution was originally on the introduction of new legislation, but was moved to final action and passed unanimously.

A resolution to support the ONE campaign's presence on K-State's campus was also moved from new legislation to final action and passed unanimously.

ONE addresses and works to eliminate world problems like hunger, lack of education, clean water, poverty, HIV/AIDS and others, said Senator David Westfall, graduate student in sociology.

Two allocations were approved unanimously in final action. KSU Habitat for Humanity will receive $600 to attend Collegiate Challenge, which is a program designed to teach members about other chapters of Habitat for Humanity.

The American Humanities Student Association will receive $100 to pay for one member's travel expenses to attend a conference in San Diego, Cal.

Three allocations will be addressed next week, as well as a bill providing, from reserves, additional funds to College Council.

Dear Prez Putin

Christina Klein | COLLEGIAN

U.S., Russian rivalry not for 2000s

Tensions between the United States and Russia have become increasingly strained in recent years. Many believe this is due in part to a U.S.-led project to place missile-defense systems in Eastern Europe, as well as U.S. criticism of Russian President Vladimir Putin's lack of commitment to democracy.

MARQUIS CLARK

According to the Associated Press, Russian bombers were intercepted in the Pacific Ocean by F-18 Hornets after one buzzed a U.S. aircraft carrier over the weekend. These types of encounters were relatively common during the Cold War; however, they have become less frequent in the 21st century. In fact, this was the first such incident since 2004.

This incident comes on the heels of defensive statements by Russia's top military officer, Gen. Yuri Baluyevsky.

"We have no plans to attack anyone, but we consider it necessary for all our partners in the world community to clearly understand ... that to defend the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Russia and its allies, military forces will be used, including preventively, including with the use of nuclear weapons," Baluyevsky said.

As if this war of words needed any more fuel, BBC reports of the development of Russian "super missiles" – capable of carrying 10 warheads and hitting targets up to 3,000 miles away that could "break through any defense system" – will fuel speculation as to the increased military nature of these tensions.

Given the current administration is unwavering in its commitment to continue the policies of its childhood toward Russia, I've composed this open letter to the outgoing Russian president himself:

Dear President Putin,

I realize that relations with those of us in the West have become somewhat strained, considering the United States is promoting Eastern European missile defense systems that are not even terrifically popular with the residents of said Eastern European countries.

Statements by those in our executive branch that call into question your commitment to democracy seem only to exacerbate the situation.

Let me assure you these are the actions of a select few people who by no means reflect the wishes of the younger generation of Americans. These people desperately cling to Cold War ideals and patterns. But thankfully they are growing older and will soon retire from public life. While it might seem that recent primary wins by an elderly right-wing senator and another Clinton mean a renewed commitment to continuing ancient conflicts, I assure you the American people will rally and elect free-thinking individuals.

There are those who feel our government refuses to represent our position on this issue. Therefore, we felt it was necessary to plead our case directly to you. We, the undersigned, as students of Kansas State University, do not take any more joy in the "Miracle On Ice" than we do in the well-deserved All-America honors of native Russian and K-State volleyball outside hitter Natalya Korobkova.

We were moved by the picturesque beauty of your mountains in "Rocky IV." We marvel with you at the hypocrisy of a president whose father was president, and a presidential hopeful who is the wife of a former president who is actively engaged in her campaign, criticizing your endorsement of a successor. And while apocalyptic cinematic representations of nuclear war do seem a bit out there, we can probably agree that fallout is at the very least unpleasant.

So try to ignore our present rhetoric and instead heed the words of a founding father, James Madison.

In "Federalist No. 14," he said, "Is it not the glory of the people of America that, whilst they have paid a decent regard to the opinions of former times and nations, they have not suffered a blind veneration of antiquity, for custom, or for names, to overrule the suggestions of their own good sense, the knowledge of their own situation, and the lessons of their own experience?"

Yours truly,
Everyone born after 1980

High schools should open later, not earlier

The disastrous ice storm in December created many problems for Manhattan. While K-State only canceled one day of class, USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden canceled four days of class and then was stuck in a quandary. How can schools make up these missed days without adding any to the end of the school year?

KELSEY CHILDRESS

Administrators came up with a solution – they added 12 minutes to the end of each day for the rest of the school year. But in all truthfulness, these extra minutes each day don't really make up the academic difference students missed during those "ice days." However, administrators had no choice but to set it up this way because public schools are required by law to have a certain quota of school days each year.

This shows that laws and regulations are more important than consideration of students' learning. Students will not be happy to come to school earlier and stay later, and teachers might feel the same.

Some of the make-up time might be spent waiting for the bell to ring, instead of teachers attempting to squeeze in more lessons. The school board is probably doing the best it can with the stipulations it has, but only to fulfill a requirement, which is what so much of public education has become these days.

The No Child Left Behind Act has made public schools a minimalist government operation rather than an academic system aimed toward fostering the development of students' intelligence.

With so many school days programmed per year and a certain percentage of test scores required to maintain accreditation, the focus on numbers has overridden and undermined the value of education. Most students who now attend K-State remember having to get up at 6 a.m. to get ready for school. In middle school, my bus came at 6:50 a.m., so most mornings I was out the door by 6:40, as my mom was barely waking up to get ready for work.

It seems like teenagers have a harder time getting up and mentally functioning in the morning than adults do. Making the school days start earlier can only make going to class worse for students, especially high-schoolers.

The Center for Applied Research and Educational Improvement at the University of Minnesota did research that influenced two Minnesota school districts to change their start time from 7:15 a.m. to 8:40 a.m., based on a study showing teenagers have a different natural sleep pattern than adults or other children.

The same researchers studied the effects of this change and stated, "Compared with students whose schools maintained earlier start times, students with later starts reported getting more sleep on school nights, being less sleepy during the day, getting slightly higher grades and experiencing fewer depressive feelings and behaviors."

Fitting class time in during the morning does little to add to students' education during the time spent in class. Ultimately, students and administrators are backed into a corner when it comes to deciding school-day lengths and starting times.

But before coming to the solution of earlier start times to make up school days, school boards should take into consideration studies done on sleeping patterns of teenagers and the opinion of students when making such choices.

TO THE POINT

Lack of student government leaders disappointing for students, K-State

In the middle of our country's presidential election season, K-State students seem to have forgotten about their own political race here at home.

Today is the last day for students to register for student body president for the 2008-09 school year. So far, current student body vice president Lydia Peele, senior in math education, and her running mate Robert Swift, junior in political science, are the only students who have taken the initiative to register as candidates.

Though leading a university's student body is hardly comparable to running an entire country, it is disappointing that out of more than 23,000 students, only two are concerned enough for its future to take on the biggest leadership responsibilities.

Also, when a team is not pitted against competitors, it might prove difficult for the pair to be truly challenged and provide their voters with a solid platform. This is not to say that Peele and Swift are incapable of offering a worthy plan; in fact, we greatly respect them for showing such desire and initiative.

However, students should think about whether they want their next student body leaders to be voted in by default.

The beauty of democracy includes the right to vote for our leaders. The U.S. was founded on these principles, and it is our duty to stay involved in our political futures and either step up and run for office, or encourage those we know who might be the right people for the job.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Local trail still closed

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A portion of the Linear Trail in south Manhattan was officially closed because of flood damage.

Gillian Armstrong, a cyclist and K-State alumna, said she enjoyed riding the trail and was affected by its closure.

"The Linear Trail was convenient when it was longer, before part of it was closed," Armstrong said. "I'm wondering when it will be repaired. Having a long trail like Linear is great, not only for cyclists, but for walkers, runners and everyone else that uses it as well."

The trail provides a few trailheads and transfer points in the city limits. The trail's Web site, www.trailrunner.com, suggests cyclists should visit the Sunset Zoological Park loop, which is muddy, rocky and uphill. The Web site gives directions for the trip from Clarion Hotel as a starting point. The site estimates the trail to be between 15 and 18 miles long.

"Natural Resources Conservation Service, which is a federal agency, assists with repairing damaged waterways," said Eddie Eastes, park superintendent. "I hopefully expect that in the near future this area will be repaired, but we depend on the federal agency to provide aid to us."

The K-State Cycling Club often uses the trail, though many of its members are staying on pavement to train for road racing.

"We would like to see it reopen so that recreational riders will not get discouraged from riding in the upcoming spring," said Gerald Hart, senior in mechanical engineering and president of the KSU Cycling Club. "I do know that the trail is not unpassable, however. There is a tree obstructing the trail and some major washouts, but people can still get by."

Bramlage reaches 20th anniversary

By Joe Vossen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With all the successes enjoyed by the men's and women's basketball teams this season, one important milestone has gone almost unnoticed by students: This season marks the 20th anniversary of Bramlage Coliseum.

Through the years, the building has been known to fans by many names, including "The Pit" (for its sunken floor seating), "The Fred" (short for Fred Bramlage, the eponymous lead donor), and "Purple Octagon of Doom" (in honor of the coliseum's eight walls and raucous atmosphere).

According to the K-State athletics Web site, k-statesports.com, Bramlage was constructed during a two-year period, from fall 1986 to summer 1988. Construction costs totaled $17.2 million, $7 million of which was financed by students.

Jim Muller, manager of operations at Bramlage, said the athletics department honors the students' generosity by providing numerous campus jobs.

"The coliseum has always endeavored to maintain a heavy load of student workers to provide student jobs," Muller said. "That was part of our mission; the students put up funding for the building, and so we return that to them through student jobs. We average about 400 to 500 students a year working for us, including security, custodial, parking operations, ushers and ticket takers."

Muller has worked at the coliseum since its opening in 1988. He said he has seen many different teams, building renovations and the installation of two new basketball floors since the original.

"We're on the third year of our third floor," Muller said. "The average age for each floor is five to six years. In that time each floor will be refinished one to three times. In order to change the logo or paint scheme, you have to scrape the surface, and as we sand it down to bare wood, we take some of the life of the floor out."

Bramlage plays hosts to 55-60 large-scale events each year, Muller said. Coliseum workers must be ready to disassemble and reassemble the floor for the 34 home basketball contests, in addition to tournaments, graduation ceremonies, Landon Lectures, concerts, career fairs and comedians that use Bramlage in an average year.

"It was built originally as a multi-purpose venue," he said. "Part of the mission given to us by the university was to host multiple types of events, which dictated that we have a portable floor. The basketball court takes about four-and-a-half to five hours to disassemble with about 20 workers and approximately five to five-and-a-half hours to reassemble. We have to reinstall all of the telephone wiring, court-side electrical wiring, data cords for court-side statistic monitors (there are thirteen such monitors for reporters watching the game), lines for Internet use, and various servers for ESPN and other folks."

In addition to moving the court on or off the floor of Bramlage, cleaning the facility between events can be an equally arduous task.

"Cleanup can take three hours following a women's game to six hours following a big men's game," he said. "In addition to that, we have crews working throughout the day finishing up. The job is never done between games. We are always tidying up and preparing for the next game so when people come into the building it's event-ready."

No matter what event is scheduled next in Bramlage, Muller said students play a part in the operation of the facility, now and in the future.

"We're very interested in being part of the educational process of the university," Muller said. "Our student jobs give real-world experience to be used when students apply for their first jobs. Some of our students who have worked here continue to come back and let us know how much they appreciated the experience."

UNIVERSITY ARCHIVE PHOTOS

This year marks the 20-year anniversary of Bramlage Coliseum. Construction began in fall 1986 and was completed summer 1988.

Over the years, Bramlage has had several widely known events such as George W. Bush presenting the Landon Lecture and Will Ferrell on tour.

K-State freshman forward Bill Walker battles with a Missouri player for a rebound in the Wildcats first meeting with the Tigers in Columbia, Mo. The Wildcats lost the game for their first Big 12 loss and will look to avenge the loss in Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday.

Conference shows balance, strength throughout season

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State took sole possession of the Big 12 Conference with an 84-75 win over KU on Jan. 30, some might have thought they would be holding onto that lead for a while.

But in the Big 12, nothing is for certain, and the Wildcats (17-6, 7-2 Big 12) suffered a loss at Missouri three days later.

KU pulled back into a tie for the conference lead with the K-State loss, but the Jayhawks also felt the wrath of a Big 12 schedule when they fell, 72-69, at Texas.

With the lead back in their hands and another road game upon them, the Wildcats fell for the second-straight time after taking sole possession of first place in the conference. Freshman forward Bill Walker said it shows the strength of the Big 12.

"This is a tough conference with a lot of good teams," he said. "Anybody can get beat on any night."

Now in a three-way tie for first place in the loss column with Texas and KU, K-State will face the challenge of playing four of their final seven games on the road. Senior guard Clent Stewart said it's tough to have the target of the first-place team in the conference especially on the road.

"To be successful in this league, first and foremost you have to defend home court and after that you have to go out and steal some on the road," he said. "Anytime you go into another environment here in the Big 12, it's tough, especially when you are in the top spot."

The next test for K-State will be Missouri at 5 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum, one of three remaining home games and a contest against the team that first took K-State's Big 12 lead away.

Missouri (14-11, 4-6 Big 12) is coming off a 86-78 overtime win against Nebraska, its first game since previously suspended senior guard Steffon Hannah was dismissed from the team. K-State coach Frank Martin gave credit to Missouri coach Mike Anderson for guiding the team through its recent adversity.

Tennis team to play in 2 weekend matches, including No. 42 Tulsa

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team will face two teams in Tulsa, Okla., this weekend after upsetting No. 34 Wichita State Tuesday.

The Wildcats will meet Sam Houston State at 1 p.m. Saturday at the Michael D. Case Tennis Center in Tulsa. At 11 a.m. Sunday, K-State will face the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's No. 42-ranked Tulsa.

Coach Steve Bietau said there is some familiarity between the Wildcats and the Golden Hurricane.

"They have some new players," he said. "We have a history with Tulsa. We play them regularly, but they have some new people this semester, and they have been doing well. I look at it as another strong, difficult test for us."

The Wildcats, who are off to their first 4-0 start since 2003, will look to duplicate past success against Tulsa and extend a 19-17 all-time series lead. Bietau said he is not focused on the records going into the matches against the Bearcats and Golden Hurricane.

"I had two things I was concerned about: playing well and earning the win [against Wichita State]," he said. "We were fortunate enough to come out on top in both of those categories."

Junior Katerina Kudlackova said this week — with three matches in six days — would be a challenge.

"I think it's going to be pretty tough since we have to travel and play today [last Tuesday]," she said Tuesday. "It's exam week, so everyone needs to study, but I guess we just have to relax and prepare for this weekend's match."

Young, talented players have led Tulsa's team to a 7-1 record in 2008, with freshman Alexandra Kichoutkin boasting an 8-0 record in singles play. The Golden Hurricane is coming off a win over the Wildcats' Big 12 rival Kansas. Tulsa edged the Jayhawks 4-3 in that match.

Sam Houston State is an unfamiliar opponent for the Wildcats and comes to Tulsa with a three-match losing streak. The Bearcats, 1-5 in 2008, are led by junior Irina Sotnikova and junior Peta Taylor. Sotnikova has posted a 4-2 record in singles play while Taylor has a 3-3 record in singles matches. They have 6-0 doubles record together.

The Wildcats have shown resiliency in recent weeks, Bi-etau sai. Antea Huljev and senior Viviana Yrureta came back from a 0-3 margin in the No. 2 doubles match against Wichita State to win 8-6 and captured the doubles point. In past weeks, senior Olga Klimova and junior Katerina Kudlackova also have come back from 0-3 deficits.

"I thought the fighting was really good here," he said. "Our team showed a lot of good in their matches. We've been pretty resilient."

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

K-State to take on Tigers Sunday

By Mike Devader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team will try to complete its two-game road trip with an unbeaten record as it travels to play Missouri at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in Columbia, Mo.

The No. 17 Wildcats (17-6, 9-1 Big 12 Conference) are fresh off their 45-42 victory over Iowa State Wednesday.

In their win, the Wildcats shot 40 percent from the field for the 15th time this season.

The game was closer than some expected, but K-State escaped a Big 12 team's home floor with a victory, which is something players and coaches in this conference say is difficult to do.

With a win against the Tigers, the team would record its 13th victory of the last 14 games.

With only one loss in conference play, the Wildcats will try to stay on pace with the 2002-2003 team, which went 14-1 in Big 12 action.

The Wildcats now find themselves once again fighting to keep their first-place ranking in the conference, as former first-place team Baylor fell Wednesday to Texas, 61-51.

Missouri (8-15, 1-9 Big 12) is desperately looking to snap a season-long eight-game losing streak. The Tigers' last game was a loss at Iowa State, 64-46.

Junior guard Alyssa Hollins led the Tigers with 14 points in the game against Iowa State Saturday.

If K-State is successful against the Tigers on Saturday, the play of senior guard Kimberly Dietz and junior forward Marlies Gipson might set the pace.

Dietz, who scored 20 points on Wednesday and moved into 15th place on the all-time scoring list in K-State history, will be playing her final game in Columbia and will try to help the Wildcats reach double-digit conference wins.

Gipson, on the other hand, is coming off one of her best all-around games with 12 points and eight rebounds.

She also made her presence felt on the defensive side of the ball as she rejected six Cyclone shots.

Tennis team improving, deserves notice

The K-State tennis team is off to its best start in five years and is coming together and playing stronger with each passing week.

Coach Steve Bietau has put together a squad that is strong enough to contend with the best, and the team proved that with a 5-2 win over Wichita State on Tuesday. The win, which extended the Wildcats' all-time series lead over the Shockers to 20-17, was also significant because Wichita State had ascended to the Intercollegiate Tennis Association's No. 34 ranking.

So far this season, it has been hard to point to one particular player for the Wildcats' success. Senior Viviana Yrureta has been solid in the No. 1 singles spot with a 9-6 record. Since the beginning of the spring 2008 season, she has posted a flawless 3-0 mark.

In doubles play, Yrureta was recently matched with freshman Antea Huljev and the duo has garnered a 5-4 record. Another potent duo for the Wildcats consists of freshmen Vanessa Cottin and Pauline Guemas. The two, who are natives of France, have a 3-2 record since Cottin arrived at K-State in early January.

Other successes have come from Huljev's singles play. Huljev, who is from Velenje, Slovenia, has posted an 8-9 record in singles play and has played well when partnered with Yrureta.

Senior Olga Klimova and junior Katerina Kudlackova have spent the year playing in the No. 1 doubles spot and have posted a 3-3 record. Sophomore Natasha Vieira primarily has played singles in 2008, and she has a 7-7 record.

The Wildcats have their fair share of good matches for the remainder of the season. In the Big 12, No. 9 Baylor, No. 26 Texas, No. 28 Texas A&M and No. 61 Oklahoma State await. Matches against two of the four — Baylor and Oklahoma State — will be played at Ahearn Field House.

For all tennis fans out there, the wait to watch the Wildcats at Ahearn will again last until March 5 when K-State plays in-state rival Kansas.

Before the season ends on April 20, check out these Wildcats. Matches begin with doubles play and then move on to individual singles matches. It is always a good show, and with the team's success this year, it's worth a visit by even the most uninformed sports fans.

GAMING

Consoles prevail

Most gamers are one of two things: console gamers or PC gamers. Both platforms have their perks and advantages.

Console gamers have the advantage of the use of a controller designed for the sole purpose of gaming. Today's controllers are ergonomic and light, and most of them are wireless. The problem PC gamers have when they try to play on a console is the switch to the pressure-sensitive thumb-sticks.

PC gamers are bound to their keyboard and mouse, hovering over their desk to stare at their computer screen. The advantage there lies in the stability of the mouse. Rather than using a thumb-stick to aim their reticle or directional pads to navigate menus, they have the control of their entire wrist.

Consoles take the cake in multiplayer values as more than one player can be on one screen at a time, increasing the social aspect of the somewhat expensive hobby. A PC gamer is limited to his or her single screen, hence the popularity of LAN parties.

The distinct advantage of PCs over consoles used to be user-created content, where people could make their own maps and customize games to better serve their friends. Lately console games have been picking up this feature, most notably in Halo 3, in which nearly anything is possible to create using its "forge" feature.

Game developers have recently started to work on a form of convergence for the two platforms by making it possible to play somebody on a PC from a console. Whether a gameplay advantage would swing one way or another is debatable, as some people can become extraordinarily good at using either.

Pill poppin'

Lisle Alderton | COLLEGIAN

Drugs such as Adderall, Ritalin, Vicodin, Xanax and OxyContin are abused by college students who will pop, snort, or smoke these prescription drugs recreationally.

Common stimulants, depressants easy to abuse

By Whitney Hodgins
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Prescription drugs used to treat pain, attention deficit hyperactive disorder and anxiety are beacons of hope for college students suffering from the symptoms of these disruptive problems. But the temptation for students to self-diagnose without a prescription can cause more problems than it solves.

According to the spring 2006 Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service Survey from K-State's Counseling Services, only two percent of K-State students have a prescription for Adderall or Ritalin — common prescriptions for ADHD. Five percent of students are prescribed anti-anxiety or anti-depressant medicine like Zoloft, Paxil and Valium.

But as the prescription drug wave continues to keep once-suffering individuals afloat, the rest of the pill-trusting population has begun to sink under the unemphasized side effects of these drugs.

"There are lots of students willing to pay people with prescriptions for a couple of pills to help them study or relax," said Erin Flaharty, junior in psychology. "Most people don't think twice about the risk involved because so many people take them."

Students should know the warning signs of addiction and the potential for abuse these prescriptions have, said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services at K-State.

"Just like people have different tolerances to alcohol, people have different tolerances to prescription medications," he said. "If the initial prescribed strength is correct, there will be a saturation point that should take care of the need."

Feeling the need to increase one's dosage of a prescription is a warning that the wrong medication is being administered, Arck said.

According to sciencedaily.com, "Addiction happens because tolerance with the drug is developed quickly, therefore increasing the amount of the drug needed to satisfy the addiction."

Some short-term effects of ADHD drug use are increased nicotine cravings, weight loss and loss of sleep, according to drugabuse.gov. Pain killers and anti-anxiety medications have short-term effects like drowsiness, impaired motor skills and stomach pain.

The long-term effects of ADHD drugs include tremors, erectile dysfunction and liver, kidney and lung damage, while prolonged use of painkillers can lead to internal bleeding and ulcers.

Students who feel the need to counter the side effects of their prescriptions by taking additional measures should be aware of what they are doing to their bodies, experts say.

"Other drugs may be used to keep the abuser calm during the withdrawal process like benzodiazepines or barbiturates," according to sciencedaily.com. "The constant switching from uppers and downers can cause severe damage to the brain and central nervous system."

The "pills-fix-everything" mentality has added fuel to an already expansive black market for prescription drugs. Not everyone who wants a prescription has one.

"Very few people who need Ritalin or Adderall will give them away because they really do need them," Arck said. "There's definitely a market for it, but it's a felony to possess a prescription that's not yours."

Americans' insatiable need for these drugs has turned prescription name brands into household names.

"Production of Ritalin has increased almost six-fold since 1990, and the U.S. consumed five times more Ritalin than the rest of the world," according to a newsletter from K-State Counseling Services.

In a country where pharmaceutical companies spent more than $1.5 billion on direct-to-consumer advertising in 2007, according to sciencedaily.com, students say they think it's hardly fair to blame pill-popping Americans for their addiction to treating symptoms.

"It's in our nature to trust doctors and the prescriptions we get, but anymore you have to be the one to second-guess whether you really need them or not," Flaharty said.

Mark Brown-Barnett, pharmacist at Lafene Health Center, said the pharmacy keeps track of students who claim to have lost a month's prescription, or that their medication was stolen, because of the high potential for abuse.

"We at the pharmacy try to instill in the students a sense of responsibility for their medication if they are prescribed something that is abusable and that people are known to steal," Brown-Barnett said.

"Students need to take their medications appropriately and store them in a safe place so they get the medication they need and others can't."

and Alan Arkin will also return to present awards at the Feb. 24 event.

Also joining the presenter podium will be Amy Adams, Patrick Dempsey, Colin Farrell, Harrison Ford, Cate Blanchett, Tom Hanks, Katherine Heigl, John Travolta, Denzel Washington, James McAvoy, Renee Zellweger, Jessica Alba, George Clooney, Josh Brolin, Steve Carell, Penelope Cruz, Jennifer Garner, Anne Hathaway, Jonah Hill, Dwayne Johnson and Hilary Swank.

The songs that will be performed on the show were also announced. Actress Amy Adams will sing "Happy Working Song" from her box office hit "Enchanted." The Disney film will also be represented by "That's How You Know," which Kristin Chenoweth and Marlon Saunders will sing, as well as "So Close," which Jon McLaughlin will play his pipes.

Billy Ray says he and Miley just forgot to buckle up

Billy Ray Cyrus says he and his daughter, the "Hannah Montana" actress Miley Cyrus, simply forgot to buckle up for one of their scenes in their new hit movie.

"We got caught up in the moment of filming, and we made a mistake and forgot to buckle our seat belts," the country music star said Wednesday on People magazine's Web site. "Seat belt safety is extremely important."

Consumer Reports magazine had noticed that the Cyruses were not wearing seat belts as they rode in the back of a Range Rover during Disney's "Hannah Montana/Miley Cyrus: Best of Both Worlds Concert."

Don Mays, the director of product safety at Consumers Union, which publishes Yonkers-based Consumer Reports, said Wednesday, "We applaud the Cyrus family for recognizing that wearing seat belts in rear seats is essential."

The magazine had noted that 65 percent of the 13-to-15-year-olds killed in auto accidents in 2006 were not wearing seat belts.

'Baby Borrowers' provides glimpse into life with children

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The "American dream" of getting married, having babies and living happily ever after is something many people hope to bring to reality as they become adults. However, some young people are eager to reach this point at a very early age. An upcoming NBC reality show profiles five couples on a quest to prove to themselves and others that they are ready to become parents. "Baby Borrowers," set to premiere on Monday, puts these couples on the fast track to adult life.

The couples come from all walks of life, and each varies in its opinions of what the partners' life should be like. One California couple, after three very rocky years of dating, decided to participate in the experiment to see if its relationship could make it. Another young woman is desperate to prove to her boyfriend that they are ready for marriage and children, while her boyfriend hopes the experiment will show her how wrong she is. The couples ages range from 18-20 years old, and they come from all over the country.

Every aspect of married life is covered in the two-week social experiment, as sort of a real-life experience in fast-forward. The first stage is the honeymoon, where each couple is given a modern, large suburban house, and has a day to enjoy playing house and being with each other. It is amusing to hear the interviews and hear the optimism and confidence each person has about what is in store for them over the next couple of weeks.

The next day, each woman must don a pregnancy belly, and this is the first moment they begin to realize that this experiment might be more difficult than just simply playing with babies. Some handle the experience gracefully, and others do not, like the woman from New Hampshire who refuses to wear the belly and makes her boyfriend attend parenting classes alone.

Then come the babies, crying and screaming after being delivered by the parents. At this point, it is very easy to develop a favorite couple, like the couple who works as a team and treats the child as their own, and to develop opinions as to which couples should never be allowed to procreate. One young woman gets frustrated with the baby girl for whom she's responsible, calls the baby "it," and refuses to have anything to do with her because she won't eat.

One person from each couple must go to work every day, where he or she makes $100 a day to provide for the family. Working all day, then coming home only to help care for a child, is something none of these couples have experienced, and it begins to cause turbulence in the relationships.

Some of the couples aren't as mature as they had hoped, and it is unbelievable how these young adults treat these babies. While some become very attached, others forget to change them and put them in different clothes.

Another interesting aspect of the show is that the actual parents of the babies can watch what is going on via camera, and they have the ability to interject advice at any time, which the young couples do not usually appreciate. Many tears are shed in this emotional program, and there is no doubt the viewer will get a chuckle or two out of watching these couple's idealistic dreams getting shattered.

In later episodes, the babies are replaced by toddlers, and then by teenagers, similar to the ages of the couples themselves. In an interesting twist, the last step is to care for an elderly person, something the couples might have to face in their distant future.

Will the couples survive? Will they come to the realization that life is still ahead of them, while marriage and babies can wait? It will be an interesting ride for these couples, and viewers will be glad these couples have a way to go before they have little bundles of joy of their own; three days of awkwardly fumbling with babies is quite enough for now.

Student group aims to find homes, provide safety for area animals

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

An estimated 5 million cats and dogs are killed in animal shelters each year because of the problem of pet overpopulation and the need for an increase in pet adoption, according to the Humane Society of the United States Web site.

Wildcats for P.A.W., a new group at K-State, seeks to promote pet adoption and welfare.

"We want to get the word out there about the different issues, such as homelessness and neglect and promote adoption as opposed to going to a pet shop," said Nicole DeMaranville, president and founder of Wildcats for P.A.W.

DeMaranville, senior in business management, said she started Wildcats for P.A.W., an acronym for Pet Adoption and Welfare, in summer 2007 because she saw a need for this type of organization on campus.

"Pet welfare is staggering, and we are passionate about educating students and community members about pet welfare and adoption," she said.

Because Wildcats for P.A.W. is a new group at K-State, DeMaranville said the group is becoming more involved in order to gain name recognition. Wildcats for P.A.W. was a sponsor for PetPoolooza, an event to benefit the Manhattan animal shelter, and has helped the DeMaranville said it has been difficult getting people involved due to scheduling conflicts for students and the fact that Wildcats for P.A.W. is a new student group on campus.

"We are trying to get our name out there," she said. "We participate in the fall and spring activities carnival, and we also have a Web site now - we think that'll help."

Need for gerontology majors increases

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

People who are 85 years old or older now comprise the fastest growing segment of the U.S. population, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. Older citizens are staying alive longer and, for college students, this means many of them one day will interact with the elderly in their careers.

As the older population continues to grow at an unprecedented rate, the study of the elderly, gerontology, is becoming more and more important.

K-State's Center on Aging provides educational and training programs in gerontology and prepares professionals to work with senior citizens and an aging society.

"Many advisers send students to us because one day almost everybody will be working with older people. When you go to the interview for a job and say that you have a gerontology background, it really does give you an edge," said Gayle Doll, Center on Aging director.

Both undergraduate and graduate students can study gerontology, regardless of their primary major. Most gerontology courses are offered through faculty in disciplinary departments throughout the university, and enrollment in undergraduate programs has been climbing steadily, Doll said.

The Introduction to Gerontology course was approved as a general education elective, and a new sociology and aging class is coming in the fall, Doll said.

A secondary major carries more weight than a minor, but does not require quite as many hours as a primary major, Doll said.

"Even if we have enough resources to offer classes to make it a major, I probably would not pursue that," she said. "I think it is a good match for other majors, but probably not a major itself, although we do offer, through distance education, a Master of Gerontology."

These programs will be useful for those who are preparing for careers in fields such as social work, family economics, psychology, management, marketing, medicine, architecture, biology, family studies and many others, she said.

For example, one former K-State architecture student came up with ideas about structure and organization of buildings designed for the elderly, Doll said.

The former student's architecture firm in Kansas City realized a building needed to be constructed for the older populations. Some interior design students have also studied aging to figure out how to plan interior space so senior citizens can move safely and freely, Doll said.

Since its establishment

K-State's Center on Aging has a series of forums coming up March 12, April 2 and April 24. Students can come, listen to the speakers and find out what can be done with a gerontology major.

In 1975, the Center on Aging has stayed connected to the research world. It conducts research on aging, considering social, psychological, economic and environmental factors.

The Center has been recognized nationally for work with PEAK (Promoting Excellent Alternatives in Kansas Nursing Homes). The goal is to identify nursing homes that are seeking to improve quality of care and life for residents. Doll said organizational and personal change can help to accomplish these goals.

"Probably the most interesting thing we are doing right now is looking at quality of life for people living in nursing homes, so we started exploring lots of different areas," she said.

"The subject that nobody really wants to talk about is that people in nursing homes still have sexual needs and sometimes express them inappropriately. You don't even want to think that your healthy grandparents are doing it. We have been writing materials about it and have had some requests to help nursing homes understand this issue a little bit better."

VOTE | Military cadet says Obama is a leader

are faced with the challenge of supporting their commander-in-chief and voicing their opinions when it comes to voting for presidential candidates, so much so that one cadet who supports Obama requested to be quoted anonymously.

The cadet feels that voting for an anti-war candidate could create conflict by voicing an opinion that is the diametric opposite of the current president's policies.

"As an individual, and in no way am I speaking for the military, I do personally believe that our country does need to be strong both militarily and economically, which means we need to have a clear vision and use our resources wisely," the cadet said.

The cadet said Obama is a leader who can improve the country's physical and economic security and also equality.

Alan Bauerly, ROTC cadet and senior in agriculture technology management, said Iraq is a very significant political issue to him. He said he thinks Iraq will end up being a U.S. military posting like South Korea or Germany.

Bauerly said he will vote Republican in the coming elections unless "the Republicans start throwing more mud than the Democrats. If that happens, I'll vote Democrat," he said.

For Mark Grimsley, ROTC cadet and senior in history, there is not a clear choice of who to vote for.

He is registered as a Republican, but he said won't necessarily vote Republican. He said he really likes Obama, but if Clinton were to get the nomination, he would probably vote Republican, he said.

TUITION | Regents suggest smaller increases

about tuition and indicated that they wanted to have a healthy discussion on the topic this month," Peterson said. "The new board members in particular said, 'We understand why tuition has gone up but considering recession, maybe it's time we establish some sort of cap, target or range.'"

Universities begin their tuition proposals this time of the year, Peterson said. May is the time when campuses make board presentations and in June, a final decision is made regarding tuition prices.

"The next step is that they've now heard our message and they come to us in June with their own proposals and we either say yes or no," Docking said. "At least we gave them a heads up and no one's really going to be surprised if they come in with huge increases and we say no."

Student Body President Matt Wagner attended the meeting and spoke on behalf of rejecting the cap.

"I think it was the best outcome that we could have hoped for and the reason for that is because we have to rely on our university system to understand the dynamics on each of the individual campuses and we have to make sure all parties are involved," he said.

Wagner emphasized that as a student, he understands the desire to avoid increased tuition prices but he also values his diploma and what it represents.

"In the end, I think some students will understand that the difference is excellence or mediocrity. Excellence means paying more," Wagner said.

Due to the various needs of different campuses across the state, board members said it was important to allow a certain amount of flexibility to universities. A balance between universities' needs and tuition must be established.

"I voted against the cap. My decision was based on the desire to give the universities and the students who also were a part of this process the flexibility to come to us with recommendations for tuition increases without be boxed in by a cap. There are a lot of variables that are undetermined right now," Docking said.

Though the Board of Regents will not set a limit on a tuition increase in the following year, they have recommended that universities attempt to keep the increases within four, five or six percent.

"It is now time to be more prudent and to stay within a four to five to six rating," Docking said. "That seems reasonable to me. And it seems that faculty can be paid, and you can function with that type of increase."

HPV | No vaccinations available for male cases

cancers, where 73 percent of the 17,626 cases studied were men.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Web site, HPV is sexually transmitted and affects approximately 20 million people.

Nikki Kay, media officer for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said the CDC does not have any information or recent research about HPV and its relation to oral cancer.

Anissa Shockey, president of Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators and senior in biology, said the organization provides general information to students of both sexes about how to sexually protect oneself. However, the group does not have any information about HPV-related oral cancers in men since the research is new.

Carol Kennedy, director of health promotion/nutrition counseling at Lafene Health Center and SHAPE advisor, said she also did not have any information about the new study.

"It's my understanding that oral cancer by HPV is contracted through oral sex, so using a dental band might protect a little bit," Kennedy said, "but there's not a lot of information about it."

The Gardasil vaccine helps protect recipients against four types of HPV, but it covers cervical, not oral, cancer, and it has not been approved for men, according to the CDC Web site.

when they went through their adversity is a credit to him and those kids," he said.

Last time the teams played, the Tigers overcame a 15 point deficit to achieve a comeback win over the Wildcats. This time Walker said he wants to get the job done early.

"I remember being up 15 points and they were ready to quit, but we gave them some life and it came back to haunt us," he said. "This game I just want to jump on them early and get them out of here."

Stewart said the early success the last time out stemmed from the Wildcats' ability to get the ball inside to the post players and put pressure on the Missouri guards.

The Wildcats got into trouble because of their inability to stop Tiger runs.

"The way they play, it's nothing for them to go on a 10-0 run in a matter of two minutes," he said. "It's just the way they play."

Martin said it's important for the team to quickly learn from and not fall off track.

"Unfortunately, in our sport the only success that matters are the wins and losses," he said.

"The No. 1 reason they come to K-State is because our students' work ethics are long-standing."

Evans noted that more than 80 percent of students want to work in the Midwest region and the K-State career fairs reflect that. However, she said students interested in job markets in other states can use CES to link to another university's services.

For assistance in preparing for upcoming career fairs students can visit the CES Web site.

Tony Boscia, senior administrative assistant, said CES is giving away Phillips 66 Big 12 Men's Basketball Tournament tickets through their Hunt for Hoops scavenger hunt, in which students will look for clues provided on the Web site.

"This is the first year we are doing this to get students interested and familiarized with our services," Boscia said.

Afghan graduate students fill their plates with traditional Afghan food during a dinner Sunday evening. This group has been studying at K-State, while two K-State teachers have been spending their time in Afghanistan.

Afghan students study English, relish life in U.S.

By Holly Campbell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Afghanistan's 25 years of war began before Sarah Ahmadi, K-State graduate student in English, was even born.

Afghan native Ahmadi, now 21 years old, spent about 15 years living in Pakistan as a refugee with her family.

"We were not there for our own choices," Ahmadi said. "We were there because we didn't have any other options."

About six years ago, Ahmadi returned to her hometown of Kabul, Afghanistan. In the year after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, order was restored enough in Afghanistan for Ahmadi to safely return and attend Kabul University, she said.

In January, Ahmadi and eight other Afghan students came to Manhattan to study English at K-State.

A grant from the World Bank funded an exchange project between K-State and two Afghan universities, Kabul and Balkh University, said Julie Lebo, grant-project coordinator.

Since April 2007, K-State has worked with the English departments of both universities and with the engineering and architecture department at Kabul, Lebo said.

The faculty members were extremely resilient, but the universities did not have adequate materials or logical course sequences, and very few instructors had graduate or doctoral degrees, Lebo said. The goal of the project was to make the universities' programs meet the standards necessary to be internationally accredited, she said.

Although Kabul University is beautiful, many improvements need to be made, Ahmadi said.

"During the 25 years of war, we have had a lot of damage, so most of the buildings are not working now, and we don't have proper classes

Instructors sacrifice comforts to teach in Afghanistan

By Holly Campbell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two K-State instructors have given up the comforts of Manhattan to temporarily make Kabul, Afghanistan, their home.

Angela DiCostanzo and Ketty Reppert, both K-State English Language Program instructors, arrived in Afghanistan on Jan. 3. They are at Kabul University as part of the World Bank grant project, through which K-State has assisted in restructuring Kabul University and Balkh University in Afghanistan, said Mary Wood, English Language Program director.

The teachers are conducting English-language training sessions for faculty and some advanced students from Kabul and Balkh universities, DiCostanzo said. They are also helping to plan curriculum and choose textbooks for English classes at Kabul University, Reppert said.

"Many of the faculty are hungry for opportunities to learn and are very eager to improve the quality of education that is offered to the students at the university,"

Reppert said.

Those instructors have faced daunting challenges working at their universities.

"Their work is very difficult, due to the lack of facilities, materials, opportunities for training and an adequate salary," Reppert said. "Many of them have jobs outside the university in order to support their families."

Because Afghanistan has been an unstable country, precautions were taken for the teachers' safety. They have been chaperoned on campus and must be driven to the university instead of walking, Reppert said.

However, the teachers have not faced any imminent danger in their city.

"Kabul is relatively safe compared to other areas in Afghanistan," DiCostanzo said.

"We have not been treated badly by anyone," Reppert said. "People in general are very friendly and helpful and glad to have us here in Afghanistan."

To prepare for their stay in Afghanistan, the teachers spoke with other faculty members who had traveled to the country, consulted with English Language Program staff and studied Afghan culture, Reppert said.

NIU tragedy prompts safety panel

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Northern Illinois University might be 600 miles from K-State, but after Thursday's shooting tragedy it might seem closer to home.

K-State's Crisis Management Committee is sponsoring a panel discussion and update session at noon today in the K-State Student Union Big 12 room in response to the Valentine's Day shootings at NIU.

The shootings, which killed six students, including the shooter, took place just 10 months after the deadliest school shooting in U.S. history at Virginia Tech.

The K-State panel, "Safety Update to the K-State Campus in Response to the NIU Tragedy," will feature several university leaders and campus safety professionals who will speak to students, faculty and staff about recent updates and procedures to K-State's emergency safety and crisis plans. One of the plans includes K-State's emergency text-message system, which was implemented last month, said Rob Caffey, director of the Office of Mediated Education.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life and associate vice president for institutional advancement, will moderate the event. Panelists include Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services; Derek Jackson, associate director of Housing and Dining Services; Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life; Capt. Richard Herrman, patrol/operations,

Local soldier leads police on I-70 chase

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Fort Riley soldier remained in critical condition as of Saturday after an alleged self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head after he led police officers on a four-hour standoff Friday.

Officers apprehended Pfc. John Hayden, 21, at about 6 p.m. Friday near Paxico, Kan., in Wabaunsee County after a four-hour standoff and car chase.

Hayden is suspected in a bank robbery that took place at about 1:25 p.m. Friday at the UMB Bank at 5923 S.W. 29th St. in Topeka.

According to a Topeka-Capital Journal article Sunday, the robber fled the bank with an undisclosed amount of cash. Shortly after, a Topeka police officer spotted a car near the Interstate 70 and Interstate 470 junction that matched the description of the black Ford Mustang sought in connection with the robbery, according to the article.

Law enforcement officials from several agencies, including the Shawnee County sheriff's department, the Kansas Highway Patrol and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, pursued Hayden west on I-70. The Kansas Highway Patrol reported speeds of up to 120 mph during the 15-mile chase.

The chase ended after troopers put stop-sticks on I-70's westbound lanes to puncture the Mustang's tires.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that took place during this week in history

TODAY 1885: TWAIN PUBLISHES 'HUCKLEBERRY FINN'

Mark Twain published "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn," in 1885. Twain, Samuel Clemens' pen name, first introduced Huck Finn as Tom Sawyer's best friend and hero of his novel "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer" (1876). Though Twain saw Huck's story as a sequel to his earlier book, the new novel was far more serious, focusing on the institution of slavery and other aspects of life in the antebellum South.

TUESDAY 1954: THE FORD THUNDERBIRD INTRODUCED

The T-Bird was born in prototype in 1954. It wouldn't be released to the market on a wide scale until the fall of 1954. The T-Bird was built for two and came with a removable fiberglass hard top and a convertible canvas roof. Armed with a V-8 and sporty looks, it was an image car. For $2,944 a driver could drop the top, turn the radio dial and enter a more-promising world.

FRIDAY 1962: AN AMERICAN ORBITS EARTH

From Cape Canaveral, Fla., John Hershel Glenn Jr. was successfully launched into space aboard the Friendship 7 spacecraft on the first orbital flight by an American astronaut. Glenn, a lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Marine Corps, was among the seven men chosen by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) in 1959 to become America's first astronauts. A decorated pilot, he flew nearly 150 combat missions during World War II and the Korean War. In 1957, he made the first nonstop supersonic flight across the United States, flying from Los Angeles to New York in three hours and 23 minutes.

WEDNESDAY 1965: Malcolm X assassinated

In New York City, Malcolm X, an African-American nationalist and religious leader was assassinated by rival Black Muslims while addressing his Organization of Afro-American Unity at the Audubon Ballroom in Washington Heights.

THURSDAY 1732: WASHINGTON IS BORN

In 1732, George Washington was born in Westmoreland County, Va., the second son from the second marriage of a colonial plantation owner.

An initially loyal British subject, Washington eventually led the Continental Army in the American Revolution and became known as the father of the United States.

BSU, student leader recognized for service

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just one handshake with senior Bryon Williams, and one can instantly feel they are in the presence of a true leader. Dressed impeccably in a black suit complete with purple tie and Powercat pin, Williams, president of K-State's Black Student Union, radiates Wildcat and BSU pride – and with good reason.

This past weekend, Williams, senior in economics, and delegate of the K-State BSU attended the 31st annual Big 12 Conference on Black Student Government at Oklahoma State University and took home the conference's most coveted award: the Clarence Wine Most Outstanding Big 12 Council of the Year. This is the second time the K-State BSU has won this award in the past three years.

"I was speechless," Williams said. "I was grinning for like, three hours. My jaw was hurting, my head was hurting, and I just couldn't stop smiling because of all the hard work we really put into this BSU."

Winning the award means BSU members have put together the best black student governing organization within the Big 12 and surrounding universities, Williams said.

The conference began Thursday evening and concluded Saturday night when the executive board for the conference leadership council announced the winners in an awards banquet.

Williams said the winners were chosen based on a scholarship packet each organization is required to put together, which he said contained about 15 pages of essays detailing what BSU has done academically throughout the year.

Similarly, he said they must create a delegate book – which is comparable to a yearbook – of all the activities BSU has put together throughout the year. Williams said the executive boards also look at recruitment retention of minorities, community service, campus involvement and group's overall effectiveness on the campus.

"We were really honored that out of all these great schools who are doing all these great things on their campuses, they selected us," he said. "We're really setting an example for other schools, so it really was a truly humbling experience."

But to suggest that Williams has ever been anything but humble throughout his college career would be an understatement.

"He's the type of person that if somebody needs help, no matter what he's doing, he'll drop what he's doing to help that person out," said Brittany Delaney, sophomore in kinesiology, Williams' friend and fellow BSU member. "He really does have an impact on us. He is a strong voice among us. He really does carry us as an organization and he makes sure everybody does what they have to do and he keeps us in line."

That strong leadership,

Bryon Williams, senior in economics, holds the Clarence Wine Most Outstanding Big 12 Council of the Year award. The K-State Black Student Union received the award this weekend at Oklahoma State University. This is the second time the BSU has won this award.

Jonathan Knight

sense of purpose and passion is something Williams said he has had ever since he came to K-State and attended his first BSU meeting.

When he was a freshman, the Big 12 Conference was hosted at K-State, and Williams said he immediately volunteered to serve on the special-programs committee for the event.

"He was definitely unique," said Brandon Clark, coordinator of multi-cultural programs for the K-State alumni association. "This conference being such a big event and big deal, he was the only freshman who stood up and volunteered said, 'I want to serve on the actual committee, to hold an actual co-chair commission.' It was then that I knew he was going to be a very special young man ... The responsibility he took on let me know he was someone to look out for as a future leader on this campus."

Williams said his experience of serving on the committee for the conference was what made him fall in love with the organization. Since then, he said he can literally count on two hands the number of weekly BSU meetings

Confrontation leads to Clay Center man's death

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A confrontation between a pest exterminator and a home owner in Leonardville, Kan., became fatal for one of the men last week.

Police reported that Howard Barrett, 49, stabbed Thomas James, 48, of Clay Center, Kan., in Barrett's home Thursday.

James worked for a pest-extermination company and had been given a key to Barrett's apartment in order to treat and spray it. Barrett entered his apartment, 111 S. Erpelding St., in the morning on Thursday and found James spraying for pests there, according to the police report.

Barrett and James had a confrontation, and Barrett stabbed James one or more times, leading to his death, police said.

At about 10:30 a.m., Barrett called 911 and said he needed an ambulance sent to his apartment because he had hurt someone, according to the police report.

Responding Riley County officers found James' body in Barrett's apartment and took Barrett to the Riley County Police Department for questioning. He was later arrested for second-degree murder, and his bond was set at $50,000, according to the report.

Police said there was no prior planning involved in the murder, and they had no reason to believe that Barrett had committed violent acts in the past.

"From what we can tell, this is a completely isolated incident," a police officer said.

Police said other residents in the apartment building said they knew Barrett well and that he had not been violent in the past.

There was an autopsy scheduled for Friday at 10 a.m. The case was still under investigation as of Friday.

HIT OR MISS

The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | BASKETBALL HONORS, RECORDS

During the men's basketball game Saturday, there was a ceremony honoring the 1947-1948 and 1957-1958 basketball teams for making it to the Final Four in the NCAA tournament. Also during the game, Michael Beasley scored 40 points and set a record for the most points scored in a single season by a freshman.

MISS | CLASS ON PRESIDENT'S DAY

Today is President's Day and, traditionally, banks, schools and government offices are closed in reservation of the holiday. Low and behold, we students and faculty aren't bequeathed a day off.

HIT | DONATION FROM KOCH

The Fred C. and Mary R. Koch Foundation and Koch Industries Inc. donated $400,000 to K-State to help with diversity recruitment, mentoring and retention.

MISS | WEEKEND PARKING TICKETS

It's bad enough to be slapped with parking tickets during work hours, but weekends aren't safe either. Unfortunately, students still have to be wary of parking violations, even on Sunday evenings.

HIT | INCREASE IN CANDIDATES

As of Friday, five pairs have filed to run for student body president and vice president. Students should appreciate their effort to bring about a variety of candidates to choose from.

MISS | UNION STATION CAFÉ CLOSING

The Union Station Café in the K-State Student Union has closed for business. It was a nice distraction from the hustle and bustle of the food court, and it's a shame we couldn't maintain its sales well enough to keep it in business.

Global Women

Feminists should reach beyond U.S.

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

Though our parents generation has had its share of equal-rights protests and marches, 2008 is not an appropriate time for a feminist revolution in the U.S.

However, author Sheila Jeffreys believes it's exactly what we need. Her new book — one of seven she has written since her crusades began in the 1980s — addresses a new side of feminism more fit for today's world.

However, the book, "Beauty and Misogyny: Harmful Cultural Practices in the West," has lost touch with what the feminist movement has clung to in the last two or three decades and proves that ripe, unrelenting and fearless feminists are not nearly as prevalent in today's society.

Fighting for equality between men and women in the U.S. is a lost cause. As a woman, I am uncomfortable with the ever-present male superiority our nation faces in education and the workplace, but Jeffreys needs to focus her attention elsewhere. She despises the use of makeup and says cosmetics and the increase in plastic surgery reflect a post-war time when women competed for a husband simply because the male population took a hit from war casualties.

Where Jeffreys and many other left over hippie-feminists are wrong is that women must still fight hard to close the gap between genders in the U.S. They see men as women's biggest competition, but if you look more closely, females' greatest competition is within their own sex.

Some women get breast implants at age 18 to have a bigger and better chest than the next young woman, not the next young man. The Palo Alto Daily News reported that 84 percent of women have used makeup or skin care products in the previous year. Women are making this choice — not their fathers, brothers, boyfriends or husbands. Most girls wouldn't take so much time getting ready if they didn't want to do so. Feeling pretty is something some truly enjoy.

In a report from CareFair.com — a skin-care Web site — 80 percent of women said applying makeup puts them in a better mood.

Almost all females have the right to feel inferior to men, but in our country the Economic Policy Institute projects the gender gap to be closed within 30 years. This appears hopeful, relative to the nearly 100 years women have been actively working to fight for equal rights. They have come a long way, and it seems that feminists like Jeffreys would be more effective in Africa and the Middle East where women have a long way to go.

While I feel that feminists in the U.S. have operated like broken records for the past 10 years, I also see their work and voices moving mountains when it comes to liberating women worldwide. U.S. citizens need to increase their global scope and perspective, and expanding feminism outside the U.S. is the best place to start.

Social standards are changing all the time, and what was often socially acceptable between men and women 30 years ago is not only many times disgraceful today, but also extremely foreign to some.

If modern feminists want to make a real difference, they should take their fight outside U.S. borders.

U.S. should appreciate life free of forced-child warfare

Call him Ishmael. Ishmael Beah. He used to be a boy soldier in Sierra Leone, and he recorded his descent into barbaric warfare in his memoir "A Long Way Gone."

Last semester, Beah spoke at the K-State Student Union. He shared how it is still difficult to deal with the memory of roaming through the forests, wielding an AK-47. He said he remembers seeing grown men cry, begging him for mercy.

Fortunately, Beah was able to regain his humanity. UNICEF, an organization that strives to combat poverty, violence, disease and discrimination threatening children around the world, rescued Beah.

He survived and was able to share his story. Sadly, across the globe, thousands of other children are losing their human rights as well. According to the Human Rights Watch Web site, between 200,000 to 300,000 children are serving as soldiers for either rebel groups or government troops in current conflicts.

Because of technological advances in weaponry and the proliferation of small arms, the lightweight automatic weapons are easy to use, even for a child. According to the UNICEF Web site, an AK-47 can easily be stripped and reassembled by a child who is 10 years old.

As a result, children in more than 20 countries are being forced into combat, either through fear, economic advantage or ostensible security. These Children are more vulnerable than young adults because they are easily intimidated and emotionally immature.

It is disheartening to see thousands of children being controlled and turned into killing machines. While children have been used in battle over the centuries as drummer boys or on warships, today they are becoming actual fighters.

Like Beah, they run around high on drugs and blast M-16s and AK-47s, some even at their own family members. Beah said he remembered the first time he saw a grown man cry. He wondered who he could trust.

For me, reading Beah's story made the civil wars in other countries like Sierra Leone more vivid than ever before. Imagining a 12-year-old boy with a machete and an AK-47 is a horrific thought.

What makes this reality more piercing is that this is a child — innocent, helpless and vulnerable. The youth are the bridge to the future, and this bridge is burning in the violence and terror of combat.

Compare this image with the ones in video games Americans drool over, where violence is actual entertainment and songs that glorify violence, making it sound attractive.

Beah laughed at their mindless admiration of violence. He said he knows what it is really like. The rappers who hold guns like toys, Beah said, have no conception of how terrible war really is. Robbed of his family and his childhood, Beah said he struggled to rejoin society. Thousands of other children now are experiencing a similar alienation. Their lives are lost in the tumultuous grind of war.

As Americans, we should be grateful that our children do not have to endure such a savage lifestyle. And as Americans, we should think twice about how we entertain ourselves, from the violence we see in our movies and video games to the music we hear.

Hey, FarmHouse and Triangle: the girls of I need a ride to the liquor store. I'm too drunk to drive. Hey, can you come pick me up?

Walker: Why do you always walk when you're on defense?

I've decided that giving up the F-word for Lent. Is a bad idea? I only say it more.

Come on, guys. You gotta want it.

Dear Fourum: Roses are red, violets are blue. Who needs a girl when I've got you? Happy Valentine's Day, Fourum.

So, they've got the International Student Center. What about the John Deere student center?

Hey, Fourum: Why doesn't anyone at the library have solid poop?

Hey, you guys.

Allegedly, even the architecture students that don't see the light of day know how to use a thesaurus.

Hey, I'm the chick with the sweet pink-and-green sneakers. Let's hook up.

I just saw steam coming out of the grates on my way to Cardwell. Is that a problem?

I like to eat cheese and rub ham all over my body.

It's called Speed Stick. It's not expensive.

To the right-handed girl who sat in the left-handed seat: Do you also park in handicap spaces?

So, what's up with the fancy lights on crappy poles over by Dykstra? Is there some kind of lighting contest going on?

Sorry about breaking and entering into your house, man. We didn't mean to freak you out.

You seriously need to start taking care of your trash.

You think it's a bad sign when you look at all your outgoing drunk dials and they're all to the Fourum?

Are those sweatpants or sex pants?

Sigma Chi: I thought you were supposed to give up something that you liked for Lent. None of us gave you up.

There's a bear in the kitchen.

When I'm lonely, I make sock puppets.

Break me off a piece of that Fancy Feast.

Too bad we didn't play Texas Tech in Africa. We would've won.

Did you know it costs $50 if you puke in a SafeRide car? Yeah.

Hey, World Regional Geography teacher: Good job on the class average being a 53 percent. Might want to do something about your teaching.

I thought Valentine's Day sex was supposed to be good.

To the girl who does my laundry: I like my boxers extra soft.

If you don't stop at the crosswalk, I will throw a rock at your car.

I should probably quit drinking and quit calling the Fourum, because I definitely tried to text you guys last night.

Alright, I want to talk to the girl who put the article about gun control, because shootings happen in gun-free zones, so I went out and bought a gun today to protect myself.

I am the walrus.

SEX AND THE CITY:
THE LITTLE APPLEMaturity important for sex

Most people will admit that sex for procreation is necessary. If not, there must be a record number of test-tube purchases associated with our generation's birth.

However, when it comes to recreational sex, the population splits. Many seem to believe that sex is a dirty, evil, filthy, sinful, bad and awful practice that you should save for the one you love. Not exactly the sweetest sentiment.

I, in no way, want to step on anyone's religious toes, and I fully support abstinence as the only 100-percent sure way to keep yourself disease-free. However, it seems people want to abstain, not only from having sex, but also from talking about it. If you can't talk about sex, if you can't say words like penis, vagina and anus without laughing, and if you can't go and buy condoms, then point blank: don't have sex.

Having sex is a huge decision in which you need to have respect for yourself and truly be ready both emotionally and physically.

As a sexual educator, I don't feel it is my job to pass judgment on the activities two consenting adults pursue in bed. I can suggest they try to play it safe and use protection, but it is not my choice.

"The images, we can handle," said Nikol Hasler, host of the "Midwest Teen Sex Show." "The act, we can handle. The idea? That just leaves us rocking ourselves and shivering."

We cannot seem to find a way to discuss sex that is reasonable these days. If a person speaks freely and openly about any aspect of sexuality, that person is labeled as offensive and deviant. If a person speaks out about their choice to refrain from sex, that person is prudish and right winged."

Is there a consequence for the fear of talking about sex? Statistics show the idea of teaching abstinence-only education is a joke; an abstinence vow breaks a lot easier than a condom.

A study published in the Journal of Adolescent Health said, "Although pledgers experience sexual debut later than others, about 88 percent will eventually engage in premarital sex. Those who do participate in premarital sex report lower frequency of condom use at first intercourse. Those who do not are more likely to substitute oral and/or anal sex for vaginal sex."

So, we have an issue, but are we alone?

Family Planning Perspectives, a journal published by the Guttmacher Institute, report differences in consequences for premarital sex among developed countries. Shocking examples include a U.S. teen-pregnancy percentage rate four times that of French teens, a U.S. chlamydia rate 20 times that of French teens and a U.S. gonorrhea rate 300 times that of Swedish teens. Organizations like Le Crips and comprehensive sex-ed have been part of school curricula since 1973 in France and 1956 in Sweden. In the U.S., the thought seems to be that this would promote sex; however, France reports average adolescent first sexual experience at later ages than the U.S.

In the end, I feel it all boils down to one simple idea by Salt-n-Pepa's Grammy-nominated song "Let's Talk About Sex": "Let's talk about you and me/Let's talk about all the good things/And the bad things that may be/Let's talk about sex."

Fabric tie-dye projects inspired by nature

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Walnuts, marigolds and bright red bugs from Mexico might seem completely unrelated, but for those who enjoy the art of dyeing fibers and fabrics, these treasures from nature could help create their next colorful creation.

Shirley Linn, president of the Topeka Weavers Guild, said plants or creatures found in nature can be used to dye fibers. An item is boiled in water, strained, and the colorful water is used for dyeing.

"We use [dyes] for wool or yarn," Linn said. "Most people in the guild spin their own yarn and dye their own yarn — silk, wool, angora, mohair, even cat hair. All of those things can be spun and then dyed."

Linn said walnut shells and leaves from the walnut tree will make a deep-brown dye when boiled in water. Goldenrod and marigold will make yellow dyes. The sawdust from osage orange trees yield a bright yellow. Onion skins can also be boiled to make yellow or red dyes, depending on the onion's color. A "cochineal," a bug from Mexico, makes bright red-dye.

Linn said stores like the Yarn Barn in Lawrence sell dyes in powder form for people to use at home. Certain items can be added to the dye to change its hue. Linn said adding salt to the pot makes the color brighter. Rinsing or straining the dye in tin, iron or chrome after it is done boiling also will brighten or dull the color, depending on which metal is used.

Elizabeth McCullough, professor in the Department of Apparel, Textiles and Interior Design, said she teaches a beginning textiles course in which students conduct a tie-dyeing experiment as part of their color laboratory. She said they use rubber bands and string as the "resist." This means that the areas of fabric covered by the bands resist the dye, creating areas of white after the project is dry.

"Students like it because it's fun, but they also find out that it's hard to control," McCullough said.

She said it is difficult to add different colors because they bleed together. Dye also can seep into the areas protected by string. Students sometimes wrap marbles into portions of the fabric and tying bands around them to make circle or diamond designs, McCullough said.

She said her students use a class of dyes called "direct dyes" — there are eight classes total — on cotton and rayon. After the fabric is soaked in heated dye, it is removed with a slotted spoon, rinsed with water and ironed dry.

Linn said a stainless steel pot or canning pan is best for boiling the dye, but it should not be used for cooking afterwards. She said she lets the fabric simmer in the strained dye for about 30 minutes. Then, Linn said she removes the fabric from the pot and rinses it many times in gradually cooler water.

Keith Kennedy, sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications, said his resident assistant in Haymaker Hall, Rachel Hood, organized a tie-dyeing program for their floor a few weeks ago. Her residents brought all sorts of items from their rooms socks, hats, tank tops, boxers and tied them up with rubber bands, soaked them in water and squirted them with dye (she brought in a kit from Wal-Mart). Then, they laid out their new-fangled clothing on trash bags on the lobby floor to dry.

"No one knew how to do it, but everything worked out really well," he said. "For as much dye that was going around, there wasn't a whole lot of staining involved. I would definitely do it again."

Use a white garment to begin.

Materials include multiple colors of dye and rubberbands.

The third step in the process is tying about 20 rubberbands around the t-shirt to create a ripple pattern.

The fourth step in the process is using the dye to add the color.

This is the final tie-dyed product. Run the material through a washing machine to complete the entire process.

Comedian fond of 'Cars,' sleeveless shirts

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Known to many as the sleeveless redneck who coined the catch phrase "git-r-done," Larry the Cable Guy proves to be a down-to-earth man from Nebraska. Larry, whose real name is Daniel Whitney, stars in the upcoming movie "Witless Protection," which is coming to theaters Feb. 22.

You are a successful comedian/actor. What project are you most proud of?

I would have to say the movie "Cars," because the movie had a huge actor list, and an animated movie was definitely the coolest thing. I had to put on about 1,700 pounds to play that role. But stand-up comedy and live performing are the best.

I know you are a Nebraska Cornhuskers fan, do you ever foresee yourself doing a movie about Nebraska football?

There are Nebraska fans all over the country, but I would have to be more universal. You have to limit your audience, but I might do it. I would like to do a romantic comedy called "Sleeveless in Seattle."

In your upcoming movie, "Witless Protection," you play Larry the Cable Guy in a different light. Can you tell us a little bit about that role?

Basically, going through the script, I'm a small town sheriff. I read up on how to be an FBI agent, but the small town crime scene is too small for me. One day, I see a bunch of guys pushing this girl around, so I kidnap the girl and take her to her trial in Chicago, even though the FBI agents are trying to take her out and kill her.

Why should college students go see "Witless Protection"?

It's a funny movie. In my movies, it doesn't show some political point. If it's just comedy, then this is a good movie to go see. "Witless Protection" makes no point, and it's a good story line, and that's why they should go see it.

Most comedians receive criticism. How do you deal with it?

Criticism always gives me way more incentive to work harder and make more people laugh. It's just comedy, and I'm trying to make people laugh and let them forget their problems. Yes, I have critics, and I don't care. Look at Jeff Foxworthy. He's one of the most cleanest guys in comedy and he still gets criticized. Sarah Silverman goes by a real name but plays a character, a character of herself, but still being a character and I knew that's what I kinda wanted to do. I grew up on a pig farm. Everybody I grew up with mixed together formed a character, and I find it funny. I push way less buttons with what I do than Dave Chappelle, but I'm the one catching more flack, but I can't figure that out. Those people who criticize me — that's who I perform for.

Do you ever wear sleeves?

I do own shirts with sleeves, but most are sleeveless T-shirts and camo. I used to tour in the winter when it was cold, and I would wear a long-sleeve shirt untucked because it's more comfortable. But I taped a movie in Phoenix in July, and it was hot. So I didn't wear sleeves, and that's how it all started. I don't want to disappoint my fans, and I never wear sleeves on stage.

K-STATE 100, MISSOURI 63

Recorded Final Four teams honored, Beasley scores 40 points

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State got a good look at its past stars and some of its current ones Saturday night.

On a night where the men's Final Four teams from 1947-48 and 1957-58 were honored in a halftime ceremony, freshman forward Michael Beasley became the first player in K-State history to record two 40-point, 10-rebound performances in one season. Beasley led the Wildcats to a 100-63 victory over Missouri on Saturday and finished with 40 points and 17 rebounds.

"I took it personally, the loss in Columbia," Beasley said. "It was a lot of things that was said that I didn't like. I made it my business to help the team win."

Beasley also set the record for points scored by a freshman. He has 617 points, which broke the record previously held by Norris Coleman, who scored 609 points in 1986. Beasley also needs only one more double-double to tie the NCAA freshman record for double-doubles, a mark that was set by Syracuse's Carmelo Anthony during the 2002-03 season. Missouri coach Mike Anderson said though his team did what it could against K-State, they could not find an answer for Beasley Saturday evening.

"Early on, we were boxing him out and that got him going," Anderson said. "He played exceptionally well. Some of that we didn't do a good job, but he's a very good basketball player. He's done that not only to our basketball team, but to other teams in the country."

K-State (18-6, 8-2 Big 12 Conference) opened with a 6-0 run, but Missouri (14-12, 4-7 Big 12) battled back, closing the gap to 19-18 before K-State went on a 21-1 scoring stretch with just under 12 minutes left in the first half.

The Wildcats extended their first-half lead to 25 at the 1:16 mark. However, unlike the previous encounter with Missouri on Feb. 2, where K-State squandered a 15-point lead and went on to lose by three, the Wildcats never let up. The closest Missouri got in the second half to K-State was 21, with K-State's largest lead extending to double of that at 42.

"You always want to beat a team that beat you first time around," said coach Frank Martin. "You never want to lose twice to a team, especially when the second one is at home. We're battling our hearts out to try to figure out how to win this conference. The next one is the biggest game when you're fighting for a championship."

The 37-point margin of victory was the largest for K-State in conference play since beating Missouri 111-56 on Jan. 3, 1998. This also is the second time this season the Wildcats have reached the century mark in scoring. The first was against Wagner on Dec. 29, 2007.

Beasley was joined in double-figures in scoring by freshman forward Bill Walker, who chipped in 18 points and nine rebounds. Also scoring significantly for K-State was senior guard Clint Stewart, who had eight points, including two of three from beyond the arc; freshman guard Jacob Pullen, who also had eight; and freshman forward Ron Anderson, who scored seven and pulled down six boards. K-State shot 50 percent from the floor for the game, including 46 percent from three-point range.

Saturday's game was the last homestand for K-State until Feb. 25, when they face Texas in a Big Monday showdown. This week, K-State will play at Nebraska Wednesday and at Baylor Saturday. Martin said his team, which is 2-2 on the road in the Big 12, will have to figure out how to win away from Bramlage.

"We have to go out and find a way to do it," he said. "We're good enough and talented enough to do it, and we have to go out like we've done in the past and go on the road and win."

With legends like Bob Boozer, Jack Parr and Roy DeWitz from the 1957-58 team in attendance, Martin said it is important to bring K-State basketball back to its roots.

"We talk to our players all the time about those guys," he said. "Those guys are the ones who started this incredible history of K-State basketball. The one thing I've wanted to do in my ten months on the job is I wanted to reconnect them. I wanted to reconnect them because the incredible history of this program needs to be advertised."

Wheeler leads women's bench effort in win over Missouri

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Junior forward Marlies Gipson didn't have her normal offensive production Sunday.

Luckily for K-State, players like senior forward Shana Wheeler stepped in to fill the void as the No. 17 Wildcats topped Missouri 56-40.

K-State (18-6, 10-1 Big 12) jumped out to a 10-1 lead with seven points from senior guard Kimberly Dietz. With 14:49 left in the first half, Gipson knocked down her first shot of the game to give the Wildcats a 12-7 advantage. Gipson, who averages 14.4 points and 8.3 rebounds per game in Big 12 conference play, finished Sunday's game with four points and eight rebounds.

The Wildcats stretched their lead to 25-16 after a basket from sophomore guard Ashley Sweat with 5:43 to play in the half. The Tigers (8-16, 1-10 Big 12) cut the lead to six points before halftime.

With a 10-2 run to open the second half, K-State took a 37-25 lead with 15:23 left in the game. With 5:53 left in the game, the Wildcats opened a 51-32 lead on Missouri.

With Gipson held well below her averages, K-State had contributions from other players with 17 points from the bench. Wheeler led the bench effort with a nine-point, five-rebound performance that K-State coach Deb Patterson said showed the kind of player she is.

"Shana is the epitome of that understated player on a team because she is kind, and quiet, and humble; people underestimate the warrior that she is," she said. "I don't want it to go without being said that Wheeler is one of the most impressive warriors I've been around in my career."

Along with Wheeler's performance, junior guard Kelsey Nelson scored five points and junior forward Danielle Zanotti scored three points to contribute in the win. Six bench players saw time on the floor and four of them played over 10 minutes.

"We've got all kinds of great players on this team," Dietz said. "Wheeler is amazing, and she has just helped this team so much. Whether it be two minutes or ten minutes, she's awesome."

K-State left at halftime down in the rebound battle, 26-23. The Wildcats came out on the winning end of the battle 44-42 at the end of the game.

It was an unusual game in terms of rebounding for Sweat, who averages 3.7 rebounds per game, as she finished with no rebounds to compliment her 15-point scoring performance. Despite a 50 percent performance in shooting from the floor, Sweat said she has focused on defense when she has struggled in shooting.

"I have been struggling a little bit, but I think coming out of my freshman year a lot of people would take me for an offensive threat, so when my offensive game is down it's time to turn it up on the defensive side," she said.

Patterson attributed the win to the strong defensive effort her team put forth in a road environment, including five steals and four blocks.

"I'm extremely proud of the defensive effort our team brought to the floor today," she said. "When you go on the road in Big 12 basketball, that's such an essential element."

WOMEN'S TENNIS

K-State's streak ended by No. 42 Tulsa

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This weekend was bitter-sweet for the K-State women's tennis team.

Saturday, the Wildcats extended their winning streak to four matches with a 5-2 win over Sam Houston State. Off to their best start since 1989, the Wildcats were then quieted Sunday by No. 42 Tulsa, 6-1.

Against the Bearcats, K-State mounted a complete performance for the 5-2 win. The Wildcats swept the doubles matches for the second time this season. Junior Katerina Kudlackova and senior Olga Klimova defeated Irina Sotnikova and Peta Taylor, 8-7 (5). Senior Viviana Yrureta and freshman Anthea Huljev continued their dominance by topping Roxana Martinez and Stasa Vujosevic, 8-1, for their third straight victory. Freshman duo Vanessa Cottin and Pauline Guemas also continued a string of recent dominance by winning for the third straight time, this time over Eleonora Kuruc and Patricia Manzur, 8-4.

In singles play, K-State continued its winning ways, taking four out of six singles matches. At the No. 2 spot, Kudlackova defeated Kuruc, 6-2, 6-3. Huljev beat Vujosevic, 6-2, 6-0, in the No. 4 spot. Klimova topped Manzur, 6-1, 6-3, in the No. 5 spot; and Guemas bested Martinez, 6-2, 0-6, 6-3 in the No. 6 spot. Yrureta was defeated in the No. 1 spot by Sotnikova, 6-2, 6-4; and in the No. 3 spot, Natasha Vieira was outdone by Taylor 6-4, 6-4.

"I thought we played pretty well in the doubles," said coach Steve Bietau. "Vanessa's been battling the flu so we held her out and we moved everyone up, and they handled it well and we played a good match."

The outcomes were entirely different against Tulsa, as the Golden Hurricane stymied the Wildcats from beginning to end, winning 6-1. K-State's lone win came in singles play, as Huljev defeated Rebecca Row, 6-1, 6-3, in the No. 4 spot.

K-State's fortunes were not quite as good in the other singles matches. In the No. 1 spot, Alexandra Kichoutkin topped Yrureta, 3-6, 6-3, 1-0 (10-4). Thalia Diaz-Barriga outlasted Cottin in the No. 2 spot, 6-2, 6-4. In the No. 3 spot, Kudlackova's four-match winning streak was ended by Carla Zabaleta, 6-4, 6-2.

The No. 5 and No. 6 spots were dominated by Tulsa, as Agostina Santoro overpowered Vieira, 6-1, 6-1; and Marta Marcinkowska was triumphant over Klimova, 6-1, 6-1.

"In the doubles portion, it was extremely close," Bietau said. "Even though we ended up dropping the doubles point, there were things I saw on the courts that made me happy."

At the No. 1 spot, Row and Zabaleta defeated Klimova and Kudlackova 9-8 (8-6).

Diaz-Barriga and Marcinkowska beat Huljev and Yrureta, 9-8 (7-3), in the No. 2 spot, ending their three-match winning streak. Similar problems faced Cottin and Guemas in the No. 3 spot, as Kichoutkin and Jie Zeng ended their winning streak with an 8-5 win.

"The singles portion was a different story," Bietau said. "Tulsa turned it up a notch and we weren't able to handle that."

After a busy three-match week, the Wildcats will have an off-week before continuing their four-match road trip in Utah on Friday and at Brigham Young on Saturday. Bietau said he has a focus for this week's practices.

"We want to improve on having us be able to adapt better," he said. "The matches I saw were a case of our players going out and trying to do what they wanted and their opponents not letting them. We have to develop a plan B."

Candidates urge orientation classes

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bryan Cox and Piper Hoskins built a three-tier platform that combine three ideologies – functional, forward and freedom.

Cox, junior in political science, and Hoskins, junior in economics and political science, are running for student body president and vice president, respectively. Their campaign slogan is "Think. Change.", which embodies their three ideologies.

"[Rather than doing] something that is transactional, we want to do something that is transitional," Cox said.

The first change proposed by Cox and Hoskins involves the freshman orientation classes. Cox said he would like the knowledge gained from the restructured freshman classes to include, but not be limited to, financial planning, sexual health and studying skills.

The second tier of the Cox-Hoskins platform encourages the campus to move forward both environmentally and fiscally. For example, the K-State Student Union currently operates with a deficit. Cox would like to find alternative ways to fund the union and other campus groups than through raising fees. Cox would like all student buildings and the Union to use renewable resources like solar or wind power.

Cox said he would like to improve Lafene Health Center services by opening the communication channels between Lafene and students.

Finally, Cox and Hoskins stand for freedom, the freedom from harm. Hoskins said students should feel safe not only on campus but in the Manhattan community. Hoskins wants to work with the city, include rape awareness and social safety in the freshman orientation classes and increase visibility of the Women's Center booth located in the Union.

Ninjas strive to rid campus of drunks

By Rebecca Perez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jonathan "Ninjitsu" Culver and Nicholas "Ninja" Birdsong are running for student body president and vice president. Culver, freshman in civil engineering, said he met Birdsong, junior in political science, through a friend. Together they developed their platform.

Culver said his platform is to remove all pirates from K-State. Culver said he aims to make K-State a fun, safe place to receive an education and wants to eliminate drunkenness from campus because pirates are drunks. He intends to safeguard the student body by targeting pirates.

Culver said the pirates are attempting to create a lake and a port for pirate ships on campus, and he is opposed to this. Culver said the pirates are attempting to create classes in pirating and that it's ridiculous.

He said he has an elite team of ninjas to safe guard the K-State population. He said he has a group of 20 to 50 ninjas at K-State, and a population of two million ninjas rallied on Facebook.

"There are only one million pirates in the world," Culver said, "but I've only seen a few pirates on campus."

To help his ninjas capture pirates, he will create signs so people who see pirates can contact his ninjas.

While Culver has never run for president before, he said he felt his qualifications were adequate. He was president of his high school's chapter of Students Against Drunk Driving, is a corporal in the K-State ROTC program, sings in his church choir and leads a bible study every week.

He said he enjoys playing soccer, reading his bible, singing and listening to music. He also said he loves to kill pirates, since he is a ninja.

SGA potentials want shuttles, safety

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andrew Glazier and Dane Miller know exactly what they would like to see change around campus.

Glazier, a senior in social sciences, is running for student body president for 2008-09 school year along with Miller, the vice president candidate and junior in political science.

Their platform covers several issues. They said they want to organize a shuttle service to transport students from their residences – Greek houses, apartments or residence halls – to campus. They said it would be an all-day shuttle that is convenient for students and would reduce parking on campus.

Glazier and Miller also said they wanted to address campus safety, especially in light of recent shootings at other universities.

"We want to get police out of their cars and on the streets and campus," Miller said.

They said they would like to see more officers on foot patrol in larger campus buildings. There are a limited number of officers on duty during each of their three shifts, the candidates said. If a crisis situation happened when only a couple officers were on duty, it might take the police department too long to respond, Glazier said.

Glazier and Miller said their third issue is tailgating. They said they want alcohol to be allowed at tailgates at Bill Snyder Family Stadium.

The two candidates said their personalities complement each other, and said they both felt they had leadership qual-

Pirates hope to re-instate cannon

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Walking the plank and re-installing a cannon-shooting at home football games are just a few points of the Pirates' platform as they begin their campaign for student body president and vice president.

Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr, senior in electrical engineering and "First-Mate" [Scott] Carlson, junior in electrical engineering, filed to run for the president and vice president positions last Friday.

Schurr said there will be several planks to their campaign platform, including adding a naval section to K-State's Reserve Officers' Training Corps and renovating the Natatorium into a naval academy where students could learn to sail.

He also said they hope to re-instate the tradition of firing a cannon after every touchdown made by K-State's football team made at Snyder Family Stadium.

Also, since the Fourth Street redevelopment project began, the fast-food seafood restaurant "Long John Silver's," closed, and Schurr said he and his running mate will try to bring it back – either in the K-State Student Union food court or somewhere else in Manhattan.

He said the team also hopes to establish Sept. 19, "Talk like a pirate" day, as an official school holiday.

Finally, as the last plank to the team's platform, Schurr said they will try to change the policy for academic dishonesty, to include walking the plank as a punishment.

Part of the reason Schurr and Carlson said they are running for office is because they have become aware of an underground movement of ninjas on campus.

"I don't think that anyone is up to taking care of this," Schurr said. "I think, if left untended, [the number of ninjas on campus] will grow to infestation levels, and who better to address this issue than pirates."

Sharpton urged economic empowerment for black community

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Over the years, during black history month, K-State has seen many powerful African American speakers. Perhaps one of the most powerful and energetic lectures came in 1998 when the Rev. Al Sharpton visited the university for this historic month.

The following article was written by Jennifer Lucke in the Feb. 4, 1998, Collegian.

The Rev. Al Sharpton said during a lecture Tuesday that today's generation of black people must invest in its own communities to gain economic empowerment.

Sponsored by the Black Student Union, Sharpton, the president of the National Action Network, was the keynote speaker for Black History Month.

Sharpton said black Americans fought through four stages of empowerment. The first three were freedom from slavery, the right to equality in public accommodations and the right to vote. The fourth, which black Americans are battling now, is the fight for economic empowerment.

"We can sit in the front of the bus or the plane, but the problem is we can't afford it," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said those who think corporate investment in the urban community will help develop the black community financially are wrong. He said unless corporations hire black professionals and bank in local banks, they are simply making a profit, and not contributing to the people of the community.

Sharpton said the "glass ceiling" is preventing economic empowerment. He discussed the 1996 Texaco scandal, in which white executives talked about how to prevent black people from reaching higher corporate levels.

If these kinds of scenarios still happen, the black community has a long way to go, Sharpton said.

Sharpton discussed affirmative action, saying black people have been discriminated against throughout American history, and most opportunities were for white people.

"America was built on affirmative action. They just didn't have it for blacks," Sharpton said.

Black access to mainstream society is being cut off as a result of the backlash against today's affirmative action, Sharpton said. He explained that government investments in farmers, corporations and foreign nations is considered good policy. Investing money in urban areas is considered bad domestic policy.

"I was taught that charity begins at home," Sharpton said. Sharpton said black people should fight toward economic empowerment instead of waiting for corporate or government intervention.

"It is far more significant to me to build our own business and to stabilize our own community," Sharpton said.

Sharpton said the challenge of this generation is to deal with the economic questions, as previous generations dealt with the questions of slavery and the right to vote.

"Don't just study black history, make some."

Holocaust author to speak about Nazi slave labor

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many of the Germans who participated in the mass executions of people during World War II were not Nazi party members, according to Christopher Browning's 1993 book "Ordinary Men."

Browning, who is a history professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and the author of several other books on Nazi Germany, will speak at 7 tonight in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union. His speech "Remembering Survival: The Starchowice Factory Slave Labor Camps" will be the 12th Eisenhower Lecture on War and Peace, sponsored by the history department.

Brent Maner, assistant professor of history, nominated Browning to speak for the Eisenhower lecture. Maner, said Browning is an important Holocaust historian.

"He's not just a scholar who writes focused, detailed accounts about the Holocaust," Maner said. "He also wants to educate the general public about what really happened."

Browning's speech will focus on interviews from survivors of the slave labor camps. Maner said slave labor does not always receive as much attention as other Holocaust topics.

Browning will also visit his stay at K-State, Maner said. Maner uses the book "Ordinary Men" in his Rise and Fall of Nazi Germany class.

"Ordinary Men" is such an important book because it brings abstract levels of policies down to the levels of the people who actually carried it out," Browning said. "It shows that it was individuals who carried out these terrible acts."

STUDENTS | Afghans have adapted

there for most of the students," Ahmadi said.

Nasim Khoshgohar, graduate student in English, is another one of the Afghan students studying at K-State. He came from Balkh University, located in the city of Mazar-e Sharif. Balkh also lacked most of the resources that American college students have become accustomed to.

"We need a lot of equipment for our university," he said. "We need books, and we need skillful and talented professors."

Despite the differences between American and Afghan culture, Ahmadi and Khoshgohar said the group of Afghan students have not faced too many challenges adjusting to life in America.

The nine students have "done an extremely efficient job of adapting to American culture," said David Murphy, graduate research assistant for the grant project. "For the most part, they've been extremely open-minded and should be commended."

However, the concerns of daily life are very different in America than Afghanistan.

"We have here security and peace," Khoshgohar said. "But in Afghanistan, we can't guess if something might happen, because we have a lot of suicide attacks, things like that."

Both students said their respective cities are now mostly safe and secure. There is always a chance of renewed violence, but Ahmadi and Khoshgohar said they are happy to call Afghanistan home.

Ahmadi was very young when she had to leave Kabul, but despite having good experiences in Pakistan she said she always had the hope of going back to her hometown.

"I think it's a safe place, but sometimes you do have problems everywhere around the world," she said. "Even in the United States, you always have some situations when people are insecure. We never know what will happen tomorrow."

Most of Afghanistan has become peaceful, but the southwest region of Afghanistan has continued to be lawless and violent, which affects the entire country, Khoshgohar said.

"I myself know that Afghanistan is a country that has caused problems for the world some years ago," Khoshgohar said.

Still, he said Afghanistan has quality people.

"There are kind people, people with respect for humans, people with respect for any religion in the world," Khoshgohar said.

Khoshgohar and Ahmadi are both determined to return to Afghanistan and teach at their universities after leaving K-State.

"Here, people are educated," Khoshgohar said. "In our country, people are not altogether educated."

Ahmadi said he wants to return to his home country to share the knowledge he has gained at K-State.

"We don't have a lot of people speaking good English, and I think those that come here from Afghanistan to study should go back, because we need them there as faculty members to teach others," Ahmadi said.

The nine Afghan students have made sacrifices to improve their educations in the United States.

"As a whole, they are a very intelligent, ambitious and courageous group, because they left their families and the lives they've always known," Murphy said.

Lebo said it's very rewarding to see the Kabul and Balkh students flourishing. Being able to study at K-State is a life-changing opportunity for the Afghan students, and they could also influence Americans on campus, because the news might not always portray the average Afghan person, Lebo said.

Ahmadi agreed that Afghan students have been given an opportunity to teach U.S. students about their country.

"I think there are not a lot of Afghans here, so I believe if I represent my country in a better way, they will have a good image of my country," Ahmadi said.

It is expected that more students and faculty will travel back and forth between K-State and the Afghan universities over the next few years, Lebo said. The original grant is set to end in April 2010.

As for the future of life in Afghanistan, Khoshgohar said he was optimistic that cooperation with neighboring Pakistan could one day bring a complete end to the long period of unrest in the country that has stretched across the students' lives.

"If Pakistan and Afghanistan work together, I'm sure we'll have a peaceful situation," Khoshgohar said. "Nothing is beyond the power of humans."

TEACHERS | Instructors miss U.S.

They also had to purchase clothing that was appropriate for Afghan culture and the cold, winter weather, DiCostanzo said.

"Kabul is an amazing city," DiCostanzo said. "Every day, I gaze at the stunning scene of beautiful, snow-covered mountains surrounding the city and hills covered with hundreds of brown, rectangular houses."

Still, the teachers have had to adjust to life in a new place with a different culture. DiCostanzo said she has managed to keep in touch with friends and family through the Internet, but misses being able to walk around outdoors on her own.

"Because of the security restrictions, I feel kind of confined," DiCostanzo said.

Reppert and DiCostanzo will return to the United States in late March.

The English Language Program will continue to work with the Department of Modern Languages and the English department on the World Bank Grant, Wood said.

Although teaching in Afghanistan has been difficult at times, DiCostanzo said she wants to see the country again in the future.

"I hope to return here one day and see Kabul re-developed and surrounded by peace."

PANEL | Counselors available

CHASE | Robbery suspect arrested

The Mustang avoided the sticks and crashed in a ditch at about 2 p.m.

Authorities said Hayden fired shots at officers after he exited the Mustang. Hayden hid in a wooded creek while negotiators talked with Hayden and used tear gas to force him out. No officers returned fire during the incident, said Topeka Police Capt. Jerry Stanley.

Hayden's wound was discovered after his arrest, and he was taken to Stormont-Vail Regional Health Center. Cash thought to have been taken in the robbery was recovered from the Mustang.

1-70 reopened at 7:30 p.m. Friday after the standoff caused its shutdown in both directions near Paxico for several hours. Initial reports on Friday said no injuries were reported and that the then-unnamed bank-robbery suspect had not been taken into custody.

he has missed throughout his four years.

Williams said he feels so passionately about BSU because of its effect on not only its members, but other students on campus and members of the community, whether it is teaching about the civil rights movement or the inequalities that are still an issue today. This passion, Clark said, not only stems from his complete selflessness, but from his religious upbringing.

As a freshman, Williams would constantly hear about BSU members who were getting into trouble or having different emotional or physical issues. So, he and a group of friends decided to create something for students to connect with each other and their faith.

"A lot of our students were having emotional and spiritual needs that weren't being met, including myself," he said. "We wanted to create an outlet to where students could really reach out and know there were other students who were enveloped in situations, as well as get them hooked up to Christ and kind of see the things that Christianity has to offer in terms of help in all these different areas."

And Worker's of Wisdom was born. Williams described the group he helped create as an interactive Bible study where members are up, constantly moving and engaged the entire time. He said members will act out Bible stories or books of the Bible in real-world scenarios, or they will engage in conversation that is eventually linked to the Bible.

This is just one of the many goals Williams has created and accomplished for the university and its student; and, Clark said, there will be many more to come.

"We've just watched him grow since he's been here," he said. "We're all very proud of him, and we know he has a bright future ahead of him."

Williams said after graduating in August, he hopes to attend graduate school at K-State studying economics and eventually work for the World Bank in Washington, D.C.

"That's one of my dreams in life - trying to make the world less polarized and more equal across the world," he said.

Proposed budget might cut loans

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President Bush has proposed a federal budget for 2009 that would eliminate the Federal Perkins Loan Program and the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant program for college students, according to The Associated Press.

By eliminating these two proposals, Bush would expand the Pell Grant by $2.7 billion during the next five years. This would increase the maximum award for the need-based Pell Grant by $69 to $4,800, according to the proposal.

The Perkins Loan is the oldest federal need-based program in the country for students, and the Opportunity Grant is given to students with exceptional financial need, according to the article. The Pell Grant is reserved especially for students coming from low-income families.

Larry Moeder, director of K-State's student financial assistance and director of admissions, said the Perkins Loan helped 2,429 K-State students in the last academic year (2006-07), totaling $3,595,818. The Federal Supplemental Grant helped 1,440 students last year, totaling $712,550, Moeder said. The Pell Grant helped 4,253 K-State students totaling $10,631,447 last year.

"We need more money, not just the same amount of money shifted around," Moeder said. "We need to reduce that need to borrow for

Diets might help to avoid seizures

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every night, Manhattan resident Amanda Ferrara goes to bed knowing not once, not twice, but at least three times while she sleeps, she will suffer a seizure.

A seizure is defined "as abnormal electric activity in the brain that causes an involuntary change in body movement or function, sensation, awareness or behavior."

Ferrara takes three different types of medication and has a Vagus Nerve Stimulation implanted under the skin below her collar bone. The VNS sends regular impulses to the brain via the vagus nerve. The VNS helps stop or stall her seizures but does not eliminate them. Ferrara has suffered from the seizure disorder since she was five.

According to HealthDay Reporter, the Johns Hopkins School of Medicine conducted a study in which adults with epilepsy went on an Atkins-like diet, which featured low amounts of carbohydrates and high amounts of proteins.

Ferrara said she has her reservations about the study, but others think it can work.

Dr. Debra Doubek, director of Mercy LIGHT, a weight-loss challenge organized by Mercy Regional Hospital, said she supervises the diets of two children with epilepsy. Doubek said a low-carb, high-protein diet is called a ketotic diet.

"The ketones get through the blood-brain barrier where [medications] don't," Doubek said.

Crisis panel addresses K-State's emergency strategies

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When tragedy strikes, communication is key, according to university leaders speaking in regard to K-State's emergency response strategies.

University leaders gathered for a panel discussion about K-State's safety procedures Monday afternoon in response to the Valentine's Day shootings at Northern Illinois University.

The shootings, which killed six students, including the shooter, took place just 10 months after the deadliest school shooting in U.S. history at Virginia Tech.

EMERGENCY PLANS

Since the Virginia Tech shootings last April, K-State has implemented a number of on-campus emergency programs, including adding extra blue light response systems, a reverse 9-1-1 program, e-mail alerts and a new emergency text-message system.

"We couldn't rely on one particular way of communicating, but this is a complex minute-by-minute, second-by-second crisis situation," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life and moderator of the panel.

The NIU shootings have created concerns at K-State, however, leading some to question if K-State has what it takes to prevent these types of attacks. Though K-State has implemented a number of devices to increase communication, some students and faculty said these devices are not consistent across campus.

At this point, there is no device available to communicate to every classroom on campus, said Capt. Richard Herrman of K-State Police. Intercom systems are available in some buildings but not consistently throughout the university.

PREVENTION

Despite the number of communication devices available, some panelists said prevention is the most important step in minimizing crisis.

Derek Jackson, panelist and associate director of Housing and Dining services, said in the case of Virginia Tech, the school shooter lived on campus. He said housing staff members are constantly trained to become well acquainted with residents and handle emergency situations through simulated activities and ongoing discussion.

Michael North, computer information specialist for Hale Library, asks a question about the new communication methods K-State has applied for emergency situations.

"Safety is definitely a component that is critical to students and their families," Jackson said. "It's something we do receive questions on and we do talk about the staff we have in place."

With his live-in resident and graduate assistants, Jackson said

Few students subscribed to potentially life-saving system

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new program aims to keep students safe if an attack like the one at Northern Illinois University ever happens at K-State, but a majority of students are not signing up for the program that could save their lives.

K-State's emergency text-message system was implemented one month ago, with the goal of keeping students aware of on-campus activities. The system will alert students about events like severe weather and other violent on-campus threats – yet only 13 percent of students and faculty have signed up for it.

TEXT POPULARITY

"We've only been at this a few weeks," said Rob Caffey, organizer of the text-message system and director of the Office of Mediated Education. "I think that's a pretty good number so far that have opted in. We're just reaching the end of our password-change period, so we expect that number to increase pretty dramatically over the next few days."

Though 3 percent of students have subscribed to this service since the password-change period, Caffey said the total 13 percent only represents about 4,500 students and faculty.

Caffey said he expects more students to subscribe to the service in upcoming semesters, primarily because of students' increasing use of new media.

"Text messaging is really popular with college-aged students, and it's a good way to get in touch with them," Caffey said. "One thing we can do is get in touch with people in case of a local power outage, for example, because a lot of people will still have their cell phones, even if other phones aren't working or you can't access the Web."

STUDENT AWARENESS

While new media might be popular among college students, of the 30 students the Collegian interviewed while on campus this past week, only two were subscribed to the service.

Dustin Sanborn, senior in mechanical engineering, said he was aware of the service, but had no intentions to subscribe.

"I guess weather is the only thing I really care for," Sanborn said. "But I mean, if something big happened like school shootings, which have been pretty recent too, you never expect something like that to happen around here. But I guess you've got to prepare for the worst."

Sanborn said he and his friends found the service unappealing for a number of ways, including the fact that students have to pay for the individual text – though it might be too late for the important information.

MOVING THE SYSTEM FORWARD

Yet, whether more students sign up, university officials said they will remain positive about the potential change this service can bring to campus.

"Nothing is perfect. No system is perfect," said Carla Jones, assistant vice president and senior associate dean of student life. "But having the opportunity to communicate with a lot of people in a very short period of time, I think is going to be significant to us. I feel good about it."

Even with her positive

CITY COMMISSION

City to discuss sale of Town Center

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners will discuss the sale of Manhattan Town Center and the offer of free land for a park with a lake at their meeting tonight.

Shareholders of Manhattan Town Center have asked the city to allow the sale of the center from MTC Development Group, LLC, Florida to UrbanCal, LLC, Delaware. The council has been advised to agree to this transaction, according to the agenda.

Another topic of discussion will be Overlay Properties' offer to donate about 11 acres of land, which includes a lake for a park area. The cost of immediate development is $554,050 and would require an annual upkeep cost of $21,000. Curt Loupe, director of Parks and Recreation, will present the item to the commission. According to the agenda, Loupe will recommend the council reject the offer because of development and upkeep costs.

Commissioner Bob Strawn said the commission wants new developers to leave "green space" within their large development projects. The green space is room for the city to develop parks and other recreational facilities in the larger housing developments.

"It is something the commission and planning board is looking into for the future," Strawn said.

Along with the lake, Loupe also will present the project repair cost to the City Park pool. The pool closed early last summer. The agenda states the estimated costs are between $40,000 and $75,000. Strawn said it is difficult to give a more accurate estimate because it is an existing structure. The engineers cannot fully assess the damage until after they begin repairs.

"The city's guidance is - fix the pool," Strawn said.

Other agenda items include the development of Third Street and Leavenworth intersection and rezoning of Barton Place Addition. The intersection is another small project within the downtown redevelopment project.

STUDENT GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS

Candidates attend mandatory meeting

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student-council candidates attended one of two mandatory meetings at 4 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union Little Theater. Candidates who did not attend the meeting will be given the opportunity to attend the second mandatory meeting at 4 p.m. today.

"The purpose of this meeting was to ensure the candidates are well prepared for the election process," said Brett Eakin, elections commissioner and senior in management. "It is also to ensure the regulations established by Student Governing Association are followed. This helps to allow a fair election process."

Election regulations covered in the meeting included notifying the candidates of what is prohibited. Candidates are not allowed to post any campaign materials on dorm premises unless posted on doors with permission of that resident.

"I think Brett did a good job of explaining not only the violations, but the freedoms we have," said Dave Hoffman, junior in advertising and sociology.

Some of these freedoms include asking for contributions and donations. Candidates must report their donations and contributions, which should not exceed $800 if personal or donated by businesses.

Any complaints about the campaign a candidate might have must be filed within 24 hours of discovery. The campaign group will be notified and have 42 hours to appeal the complaint, Earkin said.

Campaign violations can result in disqualification for major offenses, Earkin said. Major offenses are anything that can affect the outcome of the election.

"The informational meeting helped clear up any questions I had, and got me excited for the upcoming election season," said Kevin Smart, junior in hotel and restaurant management.

Face the facts

Potentially damaging images, histories stored on sites

Mark Zuckerberg, the 23-year-old founder of the social-networking Web site Facebook.com, is finding it more and more difficult to preserve his privacy these days. Zuckerberg recently discovered even he is not immune from personal information finding its way into the public domain.

JOE VOSSEN

A Dec. 3, 2007, article in The New York Times reported that Zuckerberg asked a federal judge in Boston to order the removal of unfavorable documents concerning him from the Web site of a Boston magazine. According to the Times article, the site displayed "Mr. Zuckerberg's handwritten application for admission to Harvard and an excerpt from an online journal he kept as a student that contains biting comments about himself and others."

None of us need to be reminded of the importance of keeping our personal information secure in the information age. Companies, scammers and identity thieves all want your information to sell or steal. The loss of personal information can be annoying and extremely damaging; some people — especially college students — do not realize just how accessible their information can be.

For students who do not know — or care — how much of their life is available for viewing online, the Internet has become an unofficial, secondary résumé, in which banks, parents, professors, future schools and employers can catch a glimpse into their personal lives.

Still, a majority of students choose to surrender their right to privacy and display pictures, phone numbers and other information on social-networking Web sites like Facebook. Recently, many Facebook users have expressed concern that when they are ready to trash their Facebook accounts, maybe upon leaving school or starting a job, their information will continue to be saved, stored and used by Facebook, and their ghost profiles still accessible to anyone with enough time to find them.

The number of Facebook users worldwide has soared to more than 60 million, but despite its popularity, some users of this social-networking Web site are ready to jump ship. They are finding, though, that the process of deleting personal information is not easy.

Facebook offers its users the ability to deactivate their accounts, but a Feb. 11 New York Times article reported that all information related to an account is stored indefinitely. Even users who directly request the company to delete their profiles have been unsuccessful. According to the terms of use of the Web site, "You may remove your user content from the site at any time, but you acknowledge that the company may retain archived copies of your user content."

Some social-networking sites and online dating services give their subscribers a chance to wipe the slate clean and completely destroy their profiles. Facebook and Zuckerberg know the pieces of information we give them — age, gender, interests and location, to name a few — are an advertiser's dream. Companies will pay top dollar to advertise to certain demographics of the Facebook clientele — and Facebook is probably willing to give away that information whether our accounts are deactivated or not.

Until the day arrives when Facebook gives us the "nuclear option" — the chance to completely wipe away all the vulgar wall comments, inappropriate photos and illegally linked videos — each of us should be careful what information we make available. Someday you might decide to give up Facebook as you welcome your professional life and leave your college years behind, but Facebook will not forget about you.

Like so many services available in the digital revolution, Facebook and the Internet are double-edged swords. Their ability to connect us with those we trust is coupled with the risk of too much personal information falling into the lap of a perfect stranger.

Just ask Mark Zuckerberg.

TO THE POINT

Text-message system worth students' time

Admit it: Students are addicted to their cell phones. We never go anywhere without them and don't even want to think about how to live without one. It is an extension of a person, and now, it really could act as a lifeline.

K-State is offering students the option to sign up for a free emergency text-message alert system.

The system will be used to alert K-State students of local emergencies ranging from class cancellation to impending severe weather.

It even could be used to warn students of an armed and dangerous person on campus.

In light of the recent tragedies at both Virginia Tech and Northern Illinois University, this might offer some slight comfort to students.

Remember how nerve-racking it was not to know if you needed to study for your tests last finals week?

Well, by signing up to receive text-message alerts, this problem can be easily avoided in the future.

And it only takes a couple minutes out of your busy day to sign up on K-State Online to receive the emergency alerts.

Plus, almost all cell phones these days have text-messaging abilities, and even if it's not included in the monthly plan, the extra 10 cents for one message that could relieve some unnecessary stress — or even save your life — is worth it.

So take a few minutes to invest in your well-being by signing up for the text-message alert system.

People should adapt to environment to overcome adversity

Evolution — for the sake of political correctness, we'll call it adaptation — takes centuries, or even millennia.

Animals possess certain traits necessary to survive in their surroundings. Men born and raised in the Himalayas have larger toes so more blood can circulate, preventing frostbite. This was not a conscious decision. People didn't focus on growing larger toes; it just happened. Huskies didn't have a meeting and decide to grow thick coats; time and nature decided on it. Rarely is physical adaptation a choice, but Dan Kish is an exception. Kish is a blind man who can "see" using sound.

Sonar, a natural tool for bats and dolphins, has been used in submarines and radar. Complex machines send out sound waves that bounce back in such a way that they can decode where certain objects are located. But Kish, a 41-year-old Californian, is not a man-made machine. He is a sightless man who bicycles mountain trails and navigates streets and sidewalks fearlessly. He does this through sonar in a technique he called echolocation.

TYLER SMITH

When walking, Kish "clicks" — making sounds with his tongue to send out sound waves that he then translates into shapes. He insists this is just a fine-tuned version of a technique blind people naturally use. He proves this ability is natural by having other blind people try to navigate wearing headphones and ultimately failing. His friend Juan Ruiz, who is also blind, tried this.

"I was completely lost," Ruiz said.

Without the headphones, Ruiz, who has harnessed the power of echolocation, can identify and differentiate between cars, trees, telephone poles and people.

"I would have never, ever, ever imagined that I would be mountain biking with cliffs on the side and rocks and just uneven terrain," he said. "[Kish] is making visually impaired individuals aware of what they can do."

Endorsed by Professor Gordon Dutton, a leading London pediatric ophthalmologist, this amazing skill is being taught to England's visually impaired children.

"Of course there will be skepticism and doubt, but the benefits are without question," Dutton told the London Times on Feb. 10. "It will make a massive difference to the lives of blind and visually impaired people. It has been demonstrated to me that it absolutely works."

Many blind people have found ways to use their heightened sense of hearing to benefit themselves and society. In Belgium, six blind men have been recruited by police to translate, specify background noise in phone recordings and fight terrorism.

Sacha Van Loo, blind since birth, was one of the men chosen. Originally a translator, Van Loo speaks Flemish, Russian, Serbian, Ukrainian, Spanish, Portuguese, English, Hungarian, Romanian and Farsi, and he is learning Arabic. According to an ABC News report, he and his blind peers are more than an asset to the police.

"I have been trained in echolocation; I can hear the way a sound bounces off a wall or another object," he said.

He can identify accents that sighted police cannot and can tell whether a call is coming from a train station or airport — a problem that previously had baffled police.

People like Kish and Van Loo are examples of willpower overcoming obstacles that seem beyond our control. Though we might encounter barriers, from small, everyday situations to large, life-changing events, we should always keep that bit of willpower and motivation in the back of our minds.

To the guy I made out with at 1030 Fremont on Friday: I want to do bad things to you, too.

To the freshman I gave my number to on Friday: Why haven't you called?

So in class today, my professor said we could all use a little more anal in our lives.

To the girl in the white Chrysler: Go park in the Z lot. Thanks.

Finally, you emptied your mailbox. I had nobody to drink dial this weekend.

If you want some competition, meet us in the racquetball courts.

Stop snitchin'.

To the girl that just asked how to spell "biome" in the Bio 198 review session: How did you get to college?

To the girl who was wearing a leopard-print jacket on Friday and got hit by the minivan: That sucked.

A guy came into HuHot last Sunday and left his phone number, and I lost it. So, could you please come back and give it to me again? That would be great.

To the Moore third-floor boys: We're sleeping. Please shut up. Love, Moore 2.

That human body test — wow.

Some things are better than chocolate.

Ladies: Please save us our dignity. Put your relationship status on Facebook.

Oh, God. I shouldn't have done that.

Manhattan turned into a giant slushy machine.

When I think of who could do the worst job at student body president, the only person I can think of is Bryan Cox.

To the Pi Phi in my class that doesn't wear a bra: Put a bra on.

Heta, FarmHouse and Triangle: The girls of Iota Eta Pi just wanted you to know that it wasn't us. We were at Bible study.

To the guy wearing shorts on campus:

Not quite yet, dude. Not quite yet.

What in the freak is this? Obviously, you're not a golfer.

As a child, we'd always visit Uncle Ben, and every now and then, he'd eat one of us. Years later, we'd realize Uncle Ben was a bear.

Is the circus in town, or is it just SGA elections again?

My girlfriend got offended by me using the word "puke." But that's what her dinner tasted like.

It takes a big man to cry, but it takes a bigger man to laugh at that man.

We've lost our kitten. It has long, white fur with a gray face. It has a wounded right front leg it does not walk on. If you find him, please catch him and call animal control at the police station.

Thank you.

Is it bad that I call the Fourum more than I call my parents?

The parking lot PDA nearly caused me to crash my car.

To the guy involved in the parking lot PDA: Please let her breathe, for all of us.

Didn't Salt-N-Pepa also have a song called "Push it Real Good?"

I can't make up my mind, so my favorite color is rainbow. What of it?

If you never set goals, you can never fail.

To the girl that wants gun control: My boyfriend is nicer than yours

BSU, HALO collaborate to address interracial dating

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Platanos & Collard Greens," a thought-provoking romantic comedy portraying the struggles for acceptance one interracial college couple experiences, will play at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

The play is sponsored by the K-State Black Student Union and the K-State Hispanic American Leadership Organization in an effort to bring the Latino and Black communities together. The play is also a part of black history month events at K-State.

The production is set in New York City at Hunter College during the timeline of a student body president election. The play addresses stereotypes, prejudices and urban myths that exist between Blacks and Latinos, within the context of hip-hop and humor, according to a press release.

"Our goal is to create awareness of the issues that come with interracial dating," said Bryon Williams, BSU president and senior in economics. "We think the topic is relevant to the things going on in society," he said.

Uriel Estrada, president of HALO and senior in secondary education, said BSU and HALO always have wanted to collaborate, and he is glad their ideas are materializing with this play.

"I think it provides a great balance between the black and Latino culture," Estrada added.

The name, platanos for the Spanish word for bananas and collard greens for the traditional Black soul food dish, hints toward the eclectic mix and divide of cultures the audience will experience during the play.

"The play brings together two very diverse cultures, and we may not get to see that a lot throughout K-State," Estrada said. "I think it provides a great balance between the black and Latino culture."

According to a New York Times review, "The particulars of the storyline have made the play quite popular on college campuses, where Mr. Lamb is typically asked to stage it at the invitation of student minority groups. In the past few years, 'Platanos & Collard Greens' has been produced at more than 100 colleges and universities across the country, including Princeton, Cornell and Wesleyan."

Local police officer enjoys instilling values in large family through home schooling

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though many would think a family almost twice the size of the Brady Bunch would be overly chaotic and stressful, one Manhattan family cannot imagine life any differently.

Riley County Police Department Lt. Kurt Moldrup and his wife, Sue, have 11 children and two grandchildren.

Kurt said creating and raising such a large, tight-knit family is the best decision he ever made. He said everything he does revolves around his wife and children, who are ages 22, 21, 20, 18, 16, 14, 12, 10, 5, 2 and seven months, and all have names beginning with the letter "J."

"Everything I do is for my family," Kurt said. "My wife and children are No. 1 in my life — everything else comes secondary to them. Having a close family is very important to us. We do a lot together, and all our kids are very close to each other."

Kurt said he believes raising godly children with great character is his purpose in life. He said equipping them with the strong beliefs and a nature he and his wife think they should have is how he determines personal success.

"I want to be able to give them the knowledge, character and faith to be able to do whatever God calls them to do," Kurt said. "I consider my children ambassadors for Christ; whatever their calling or job task is, I want to equip them to be able to honor God in everything they do."

Kurt and his wife decided that home schooling their 11 children was the best way to create this godly and honorable character they wanted each one of their children to possess.

Kurt said though it is not easy, he thinks the advantages of home schooling over public schooling are numerous, and he said he thinks the best education he and his wife can give to their children is one they provided themselves.

He said he and his wife can give the education best for each individual child, and he thinks his wife can tailor education to each individual need, which he says public schooling cannot do.

"God gave us the responsibility to raise our children and pass on faith and good character," Kurt said. "No one can do that as well as parents. There is an infinite amount of knowledge out there, and we'll decide what we think is most important for them to learn. We have more to teach them than what schools can teach them."

All his children take the state-standardized tests to determine in which area each child needs attention, Kurt said.

He said homeschooling up until their college years has worked out great, and he has two children who attend K-State. His 21-year-old is graduating in May and already has a job settled at Lockheed Martin in Washington, D.C.

Kurt's wife agreed home schooling has worked out wonderfully for her family.

"The main reason we decided to home school our children is for character, and everyone is doing very well," Sue said. "I appreciate the time I have with them and interacting with them on such a close-knit level. I've been able to watch my kids grow up all the way through their high-school years, which is something a lot of parents don't get to do. I have no regrets at all."

Kurt said being a family man has positively molded his life into what it is, and he cannot imagine what it would be like to not be married or have so many children.

"Being married is great — it's about having your best friend with you through everything," Kurt said. "I can't even put into words what being a dad is, though."

"Raising children who are good citizens and have a strong faith in God is the best contribution I can give to the world. My impact with my family will be lasting. My wife and I have a great marriage too, which sets up a great example for our kids."

Kurt said he and his wife were married on Nov. 19, 1983. He said they met when they were K-State students through Ichthus, a campus ministry.

He was also a houseboy at Sue's sorority, Chi Omega. Sue invited him to one of Chi Omega's date parties, and they fell in love, Kurt said.

Kurt said he and his family have a very active household with so many children, and that there is always someone around and something to do.

"Having so many kids is a lot of fun and a lot of work," Kurt said. "Without them, my life would be boring."

"It's expensive, though, and they see me having to work a lot and learn good, strong work ethic. Most of them add to the family income; we help each other out."

All the Moldrup children are very involved in music and athletics, Kurt said. They are all required to learn to play the piano, and they almost all play stringed instruments.

His 21-year-old son Justin is a concert master for the K-State Orchestra, and all the children are involved with the Gold Orchestra.

He said they also almost all play traveling soccer and their home school association sports. They are all social, outgoing and confident children, he said.

Justin, senior in information systems, said his father tries to spend as much time with him and his siblings as possible.

He said though their household can be chaotic, everyone gets along, and he enjoys spending time with his siblings and watching them grow up.

"Our huge family isn't a cheap thing, and my dad doesn't make tons of money," Justin said. "He works a lot, but he still does a lot of things with us."

Sue agreed Kurt does a great job of managing his time for his family.

"Kurt has a great relationship with our children," she said. "He focuses a lot on one-on-one time, and he is the more lighthearted and fun one. He tries to interact with them and be with them as much as he can."

More progress needed for successful Olympics

With just a few months remaining before the 2008 Olympic Games, big strides have been made to prepare host-city Beijing for this year's games. The games will run from Aug. 8-24, and the Communist Party of China hopes to showcase the country, whose markets and athletes are already coveted on a regular basis by entities and countries around the world.

To prepare for the games, 12 new venues have been constructed, 11 have been renovated and eight temporary venues have been built. Also, to counter the purported 500,000 to 550,000 visitors who will flock to this year's Olympics, the city of Beijing is not slouching construction-wise. Many new stories on the official Olympic Web site proudly tout the construction as green friendly, but with the reports of continued air pollution and other infrastructure issues, questions as to the validity of those claims need to be resolved or else it will be further proof the claims are just baseless propaganda.

Beijing Capital International Airport is being upgraded and enlarged, as well as the city's subway line, which is being expanded and is expected to open those portions by July of this year. Also, the crown jewel of this year's ceremonies, Beijing's National Stadium, is set to open next month and should undoubtedly awe the world with its unique architecture, which inspired the nickname "The Bird's Nest."

All of this progress is definitely something to be proud of, but there are still issues at hand that might put a damper on the games. Jacques Rogge, International Olympic Committee president, has raised concerns that some of the endurance sports might need to be delayed a few days because of air pollution.

"It would not be necessary for all sports," Rogge told the London Times in Aug. 2007. "Sports with short durations would not be a problem. But definitely the endurance sports like the cycling race, where you have to compete for six hours, are examples of competitions that might be postponed or delayed to another day."

Randy Wilber, the lead exercise physiologist for the United States Olympic Committee, has even gone as far as to suggest arriving in Beijing as late as possible, according to a January article in The New York Times.

Some of Wilber's other ideas include having the athletes wear specifically designed masks from arrival in Beijing until they compete and testing Olympians to see

Boozer sees NBA in futures for Beasley, Walker

Bob Boozer is a K-State legend from the days when Ahearn Field House used to give opponents nightmares and basketball was synonymous with the Wildcats. He was an All-American forward, leading K-State to the Final Four in 1958. He holds the record for scoring average in a season, when he averaged 25.6 points through 27 games in 1959.

Following his years at K-State, he was the No. 1 NBA draft pick to the Cincinnati Royals in 1959. He spent 13 years in the NBA. He also was a part of the 1960 U.S. Olympic basketball team, which won the gold medal during the Summer Olympics in Rome, Italy. Boozer recently sat down with the Collegian to discuss the Wildcats' recent success on the court.

Have you watched K-State much this season?
Just a few times on television.

BOB BOOZER'S YEARLY AVERAGES:

1956-57 (sophomore year): 23 games played, 44.3 field-goal percentage, 77.1 free-throw percentage, 10.3 rebounds per game, 19.6 points per game
1957-58 (junior year): 27 games played, 44.2 field-goal percentage, 71.6 free-throw percentage, 10.4 rebounds per game, 20.1 points per game
1958-59 (senior year): 27 games played, 42.7 field-goal percentage, 76.4 free-throw percentage, 11.3 rebounds per game, 25.6 points per game.

Career: 77 games played, 43.6 field-goal percentage, 75.1 free-throw percentage, 10.7 rebounds per game, 21.9 points per game.

*Freshman team statistics not available

What has been your overall impression?

I've been impressed with Michael Beasley, of course, because of his size and his ability to put the ball on the floor and go to the hoop. He's got a nice, soft touch, and there's no question that he's going to be able to go to the next level. It's just a matter of when.

Would Beasley be able to go to the NBA right now?

Well, from my own interpretation and from my background, certainly, I would like to see him finish at Kansas State. But with that kind of talent, it's one and done, but that's me speaking. You risk injury, you risk blowing out an Achilles or tearing a muscle that doesn't heal back properly. It's a lot of pressure with kids these days with the money they're throwing around.

How about your impression of this freshman class? You have Walker, Sutton and Pullen.

Walker plays like a man amongst boys. He's a talent also. It's an impressive class, so it's nice to see Kansas State get some players to inch them way up to the top of the Big 12.

What have been your thoughts on Frank Martin so far?

I don't analyze coaches. I analyze ballplayers. I like the ballplayers because the ballplayers are who gets it done in the court. The talent is here, so obviously, the coaches are getting it done.

Who do you see as being the most successful in the NBA?

Both Michael Beasley and Bill Walker.

When you hear these rowdy Bramlage Coliseum crowds, does it ever bring you back to the days of Ahearn?

Absolutely. These fans used to lift the roof at Ahearn. It was quite a place to play, and the fans have always been great here at Kansas State. You can't say enough good

Women's golf team looks to continue fall success in 1st spring tournament

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team is kicking off its spring season with the Central District Invitational this week at the River Wilderness Golf Course in Parrish, Fla.

Michigan State will host the tournament, which began Monday and will continue through today. Both days will begin with a shotgun start at 8 a.m.

The team and its coaching staff said they are hoping to build off their success in the fall season.

Coach Kristi Knight is in her 13th season as the head women's golf coach. The team had a solid fall campaign that netted four top-5 finishes.

K-State began the season with a second-place finish at the Chip-n-Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb. The Wildcats then traveled to Highlands Ranch, Colo., for the Denver Ron Moore Intercollegiate, where the team tied for 16th place. The team then tied for third place in its own tournament, the Marilyn Smith/Sunflower Invitational.

The Wildcats wrapped up the fall portion of its schedule with a second-place finish in the Bronco Fall Invitational, which was played on Boise State's home golf course in Kuna, Idaho. They also finished third in the Edwin Watts/Palmetto Intercollegiate.

Seniors Michelle Regan and Kali Quick have led the Wildcats during the season. The duo has combined for five individual top-5 finishes so far, including one tournament win. They also hold the two lowest stroke averages on the team.

Each team played 36 holes Monday, followed by another 18 Tuesday. The two rounds played Monday will determine the final round pairings Tuesday. The four lowest individual scores will determine each team's total score.

The Wildcats will compete against a 15-team field that is heavy in Big Ten and Big 12 teams. K-State is 3-5-0 against the Central District Invitational field, which includes Baylor, Indiana, Kent State, Michigan, Michigan State, Missouri, Nebraska, Northwestern, Notre Dame, Ohio State, Oklahoma, Southern Methodist, Texas and

After the first day of play, K-State is in 15th place with an overall score of 646. Senior Hailey Mireles and sophomore Abbi Sunner posted the two lowest scores for the Wildcats. Mireles leads the team with a 14-over par score of 158, and was tied for 43rd overall. Sunner finished the day 54th with a 16-over par score of 160.

KSU freshman top rookie for 4th-consecutive time

Freshman forward Michael Beasley keeps inching closer to surpassing Seattle SuperSonics Kevin Durant's accomplishments.

Beasley was named Big 12 Rookie of the Week for the fourth-consecutive week, a Big 12 record. He is also tied with former Texas player Kevin Durant for most rookie honors in a season.

Beasley averaged 31 points and 16 rebounds against Texas Tech and Missouri last week. During the Missouri game, he went off for 40 points and set the record for most points scored by a Wildcat during their freshman campaign (617).

Meatless menu

Vegetarians, vegans explore healthy options

By Hannah Blick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a world in which the beautiful are synonymous with the thin, we are surrounded by diets. From those infamous New Year's and spring-break vows of strict dieting to the ever-popular consumer diets like Atkins and South Beach, there is no escaping them.

Dieters cut carbs, force themselves to order spinach, and most often, find their lives are already stressful enough without having to worry about how many unwanted calories are in each delicious M&M.

But what if there was a diet that required its followers to sacrifice just one type of food — a food that often is not even appealing to them?

Kate Killingsworth said she believes she has found the diet, or rather, lifestyle, that is perfect for her — she is a vegetarian.

"I just feel healthier, I can't even explain it," she said. "I definitely have more energy."

A HEALTHY DECISION

Killingsworth, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy, said she stopped eating red meats and chicken about three years ago because she wanted to cut back on saturated fats and cholesterol. She said she still eats seafood.

"I just don't like to eat anything I can pet," she said. "I know that sounds weird, but that's just how I feel. It bothers me."

Mary Meck Higgins, associate professor in human nutrition and nutrition specialist for K-State Research and Extension, said many people have misconceptions about meatless diets, and most don't understand the difference between a vegetarian and a vegan.

She said there are several variations of vegetarians, but that most of them simply choose not to eat certain kinds of meats, like beef or poultry.

Vegans, however, typically choose not to eat any form of meat, including seafood or even animal products like eggs, cheese or milk, Higgins said. She also said some vegans go so far as to boycott leather products and refusing to eat plant-type foods like fruits.

"Many vegans object to the killing and mistreatment of animals, whereas most vegetarians are in it for the health benefits," she said. "But everyone has their own personal reason for what they choose."

Higgins, also a registered dietician, said she has worked on research projects that help people pursue a vegetarian or vegan diet in a healthy way. She said she also consults with meatless dieters and urges them to consider the nutritional aspect of the decision.

"When someone changes their diet and cuts out an entire food group, they need to think about the nutritional status," Higgins said. "Most people don't really think about it as much as they should, and that's when you run into unhealthy habits."

"It's just really important to think about what nutrients the meat provides and then learn how to appropriately replace them with healthy options. It's very possible. You just have to make it a routine, like with anything."

Finding something to order at a restaurant can be difficult for vegetarian Kate Killingsworth, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy, but restaurants like Subway and Chili's offer healthy, meatless options at reasonable prices.

Killingsworth, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy, looks over the menu at Chili's. She said Chili's black-bean burger is perfect for vegetarians.

MAKING IT WORK

Sheryl Klobasa, registered dietician and unit director for Kramer Dining Center, said the on-campus dining centers are willing to work with students who have special diets to provide them healthy options at every meal. She also said Kramer has a comment box located in the dining center for students to voice their concerns about a lack of the foods they need.

"We have a lot to offer, but maybe it's still not what they want," she said. "That's when we take the comments seriously and try and communicate about what they might like to eat."

Killingsworth said she has not been in many situations where she had no vegetarian options available. She lived in Moore Hall her freshman year, and she said the residence hall dining

MUSIC REVIEW

New Smashing Pumpkins EP brings great balance to latest album

"American Gothic"

Review by Alex Peak

I picture Billy Corgan of the Smashing Pumpkins just sitting around with bandmate Jimmy Chamberlin. Corgan's tipping his chair, scratching the back of his bald head saying, "So, Jimmy, we have the extra four songs from 'Zeitgeist.' Should we just keep playing them randomly at shows, or make a buck and sell them through iTunes?"

That's how I see it happening, anyway. According to an interview with Uncut Magazine, Corgan said he had written extra material during tours and residencies in San Francisco in late 2007.

"Fans kept asking us if we were gonna put any of that stuff out," Corgan said. "iTunes came to us wanting to do something together, so it just felt right."

After much anticipation from fans (and finger crossing for sounds better than Zwan's "Mary Star of the Sea" and other late Pumpkins' albums), "Zeitgeist" was released in July 2007. It was just what Smashing Pumpkins fans needed — something refreshingly new but still comfortable and akin to the old Pumpkins' raucous sound.

The new EP "American Gothic," though slightly unexpected, is a great complement to the rest of the new album. Songs "March Rose," "Again, Again, Again," "Pox" and "Sunkissed" are softer ballads, compared to the hard rock of "Tarantula," "Bleed the Orchid" and "United States" on "Zeitgeist." The EP reflects sounds similar to Pumpkins' older songs like "Tonight, Tonight," "1979" and "Perfect."

As it seems a blind pattern for the group, many sleeper tunes appear on EPs or singles. Examples of these buried golden nuggets include songs "Once in a While" from the "Ava Adore" single and "God" which appeared on the "Zero" single. These songs trump the quality of other leading songs, but unless you're an avid fan you probably don't even know they exist. Some of the band's best material is hidden on EPs and singles that often are released in small quantities and usually not internationally.

As a Smashing Pumpkins' connoisseur (i.e. owning every album and nearly every single and EP, having been less than half an inch from Corgan and traveling as far as Baltimore to see the group ... and not to forget, waiting in line for 12 hours to get tickets, considering Corgan a teenage heartthrob and painting lyrics to songs and an album cover on my bedroom walls during my teen-angst years), I think the combination of the two releases ("Zeitgeist" and "American Gothic") make for a wonderful balance between the hard-rock grunge and the amour-filled lyrics fans have come to expect and appreciate.

Despite only having two remaining members from the original Pumpkins troupe, nothing can compete against the talent of drummer Chamberlin and singer/songwriter/guitarist/ringleader Corgan. Who knows whether they're doing it for the music or for the extra moolah. Either way, they're doing it, and they're doing it well.

Fans just have to wince and try to forget about the last few painful duds the Pumpkins slipped out and trust they got their act together this time.

TO THE EDITOR

Readers respond to gun-control column

Editor,

I'm writing in response to Jessica Hensley's "Stricter gun control needed to decrease school shootings" column published Feb. 14. Her position that further gun regulation would have prevented the latest school shooting specifically – and put an end to gun violence generally – is entirely unfounded.

Hensley doesn't reference a particular shooting, but one could presume she's referring to an Oxnard, Calif., incident involving the fatal shooting of a 15-year-old boy shortly after classes began. Police will not release details of the exact make and model of the firearm used, or how it was obtained – only that it was a black handgun.

Hensley's column implies stricter gun regulation would have kept the weapon out of the culprit's hands as "the vast majority of guns used in deadly crimes were purchased legally." Absolutely no FFL dealer in the United States would sell a handgun to any person under 21, regardless of background checks or waiting periods. It is only speculation at this point, but the shooter probably stole the handgun from his father's collection. Even if he had no access to firearms, his commitment to acting on the other student would have motivated him to use a common kitchen knife out of necessity. As the old adage goes, "Guns don't kill people, people kill people."

Those necessary gun-control laws want to remove every firearm from public ownership for us to reach that perfect utopia gun opponents dream of. The harsh reality is public disarmament leads to tragedy. Britain saw a 300-percent increase in violent crime after its handgun ban was in effect, while Switzerland enjoys a relative peace with issued service rifles in homes. The firearm abuse problem can't be resolved with more regulation, but by better public education and responsibility by legal gun owners.

A reactionary response to gun crime and public shootings is not tighter gun control but more widespread enactment of conceal-and-carry. Criminals have a field day when their victims are unarmed as demonstrated in Britain's case, and the psychological effect of armed victims serves as a successful deterrent with no shots fired. Armed citizens could have limited the body count at Virginia Tech as well as the recent mall and city council shootings far more effectively than more faulty legislation.

Hensley and other gun opponents in the media and political offices must educate themselves on the facts of gun crime and failed legislation before spewing more propaganda.

Brandon Lohman
GRADUATE STUDENT IN PHYSICS

Editor,

I am writing in response to the article by Jessica Hensley in regard to stricter gun-control laws. In her column, she claims stricter gun laws will prevent school shootings. This follows a pattern of the media trying to place the blame somewhere after one of these tragedies. While stricter gun laws might delay or prevent children from obtaining a weapon, it does not address the issue the media can control. The media has made these shooters into idols for out-cast children, and has, in their minds, glorified the shooter's actions. To make my point, I ask you to name the victims of the Columbine shootings. Come up with anything? How about the shooters' names? You probably can name them. The same goes with the Virginia Tech shootings. Most can at least describe the shooter, but the names and faces of the victims are lost.

The press needs to accept responsibility for its actions.

One can't make the point of restricting the Second Amendment without addressing how the use of the First Amendment has created a problem too. All I ask is that in the future, the media focus on the victims and leave the details of the shooters to fade into history. This might prevent the glorification of these heinous events.

if they qualify for an IOC exemption to use an asthma inhaler. He also warned of potential exercise-induced asthma attacks that could seriously alter gold-medal hopes for any contender.

"It could mean the difference between a gold medal and finishing in the back of the pack," Wilber said in the article.

Other concerns include the lack of drinkable tap water outside the Olympic Village. Bi Xiaogang, vice director general of the Beijing Water Management Bureau, told USA Today in May 2007 the quality of water is altered during the transfer process.

"We are still working on upgrading the secondary facilities," Xiaogang said. "But in the Olympic Village we will provide safe drinking water from the tap."

There is no need to diminish the level of progress that has been achieved in preparing Beijing for the 2008 Olympic Games, but continued diligence is a must to ensure success. Delaying events a few days because of air quality is unacceptable, and the efforts to improve on air pollution must not cease at the Olympics.

That issue, coupled with the quality of water and the constant overtones of human rights violation by the ruling Communist Party, must be heeded and changed. Issues like that of journalist Lu Gengsong, who has recently been jailed for "inciting subversion of state power," for essays he wrote that were critical of the Communist Party. Incidents like this are hardly isolated in a country that has 25 journalists and 49 cyber-dissidents jailed, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists and Reporters Without Borders.

For the world to truly support this year's Olympics, changes must be made and basic human rights must be respected. Such actions can only ensure a more successful 2008 Olympics.

DIETS | Eating habits affect seizures

Ketones are chemical by-products from the body breaking down protein and other fatty acids. Doubek said the two children whose diets she supervises are two and four years old. Both these children have taken anti-convulsion drugs and not gotten the desired results.

"These children have tried medications and have failed," Doubek said. "[The children suffer] 50 to 80 percent less seizures [because of the diet]."

According to the Johns Hopkins study, patients who successfully completed the six-month trial diet experienced a 50-percent reduction in the number of seizures. The diet required patients to eat less than 15 grams of carbohydrates a day. The rest of the calorie intake was to come from fats and proteins.

The study reported after three months on the diet, one-third of the patients had dropped out of the study, stating the diet was too difficult to follow.

Ferrara said the diet sounded odd.

"I would try it if [the diet] wasn't totally ridiculous sounding," she said. "There's all kinds of weird diets. There's one where you just eat bacon, and there's one where you don't eat sugar at all [for controlling seizures]."

Doubek said it requires a little creativity to keep the children interested in sticking to the diet. The diet is also not designed to be life long.

"My children drink whipping cream instead of milk," Doubek said. "The long-term plan is they will only be on this diet for two to three years. It diminishes the seizures for the rest of their life."

According to the Centers for Disease Control, epilepsy affects 2.7 million Americans. The CDC defines epilepsy as "a general term that includes various types of seizures."

To be diagnosed as epileptic, a patient must suffer more than one seizure episode and more than one type of seizure.

The CDC reported more than one-third of epilepsy patients still have seizures while receiving treatments.

these staff members are able to have a deeper grasp on problems truly bothering students. Social-networking sites like Facebook.com have also helped staff learn more about residents who might need help.

"On Facebook, I know when someone ends a relationship. And sometimes that's a good time to step up and talk to someone and ask, 'How are you doing?'"

PHONE & INTERNET MEDIA

While Facebook might be an effective way to reach out to students, new technology like the Internet and cellular phones are avenues the university plans to take advantage of, especially with younger generations hooked to these services.

One of these new technologies include K-State's emergency text-message system, which was implemented last month. Nearly 4,500 students and faculty are subscribed to the new system, reaching about 13 percent of those eligible for the service, said Rob Caffey, organizer of the text-message system and director of the Office of Mediated Education.

"We'd like to tie this in some better ways with the overall strategy," Caffey said. "We'd like to extend the types of notifications we can make it available more broadly to more people."

Though thousands of more students and faculty are eligible to use the text-message program, a majority of the student body is reached through a combination of services.

"I see it as one method among many methods that the university would use to get our message out if there was a serious emergency," said Carla Jones, assistant vice president and senior associate dean of student life. "I would feel I would be in touch with our students much more quickly. It would give us a broad range of people to contact. I think that its presence on the campus is going to be significantly important to us."

CAMPUS POLICE

It's important not to undermine the power of on-campus safety, said Andrew Glazier, senior in social sciences. He said after speaking with on-campus police this past week, he learned the station is severely understaffed.

"When a dispatcher is sick, they take a police officer off the streets and put them in that dispatcher's place," Glazier said. "A police officer is taken off the streets, who could be protecting our students. We need more support staff for the police to help them out, to make our campus safe."

POST-TRAUMA ASSISTANCE

Though panelists agree that K-State has taken many steps toward addressing potential tragedies like at NIU, there are a number of services available in response to crisis.

"We all work together very closely together and communicate," said Heather Reed, assistant dean of student life. "We have good policies and great support services for our students."

Reed said the Office of Student Life has counselors available to anyone who needs assistance dealing with last week's tragedy at NIU.

BUDGET | Proposal will affect loan future

college and provide grants for students who really need it."

Moeder said the Perkins Loan is a revolving federal loan fund.

This means the government makes a capital contribution to a university and the university matches 25 percent of that.

Students then pay back their loans plus interest to the university, and the school can use that money to distribute more loans, Moeder said.

"If there is no money coming in [from the government], then there is also no match," Moeder said.

Family income determines how much money a student can receive from a Pell Grant, Moeder said. It was increasing by $421 per year per eligible student up until the 2006-07 school year, when the maximum Pell Grant reached $4,050. Moeder said the maximum grant for the 2008-09 school year will be $4,731; the minimum will be $890.

"Any increase students can receive is great," Moeder said. "Hopefully we'll find some way to provide that assistance without having to cut other student aid programs."

John Fliter, associate professor in political science, said Bush's proposal will have to undergo the scrutiny of congressional committees and subcommittees before Congress can consider passing it. He said this process could take up to a year.

"I would imagine it will come up against a lot of opposition from the Democrats," Fliter said.

Brittany Foster, sophomore in apparel and textile design, is a Pell Grant recipient. She said her mother is putting her sister through private school right now, so the budget proposal would affect her. But she said the Pell Grant increase does not seem very large.

"I'm trying to take out as many loans and grants as I can so [my mom] won't have to pay for my school," Foster said.

TEXTING | System has multiple backups

attitude, Jones said the system could be rather confusing for other first-time users. She initially signed up for the service this past month but thinks she accidentally unsubscribed to the service via text message.

Jones and other text-message officials said throughout this first phase of the text system, they plan to get through as many problems as possible. The university plans to send test text messages twice a year, with the first test on Feb. 27.

"It gives students an opportunity to feel like the university is going to notify them if there is an emergency," Jones said, "and I think brings the comfort level up for students, as well as faculty/staff and parents and families who would not have to worry about their child getting information."

OTHER SAFETY PLANS

Though on-campus safety is a priority throughout the university, Derek Jackson, associate director of housing and dining services, said it's especially a concern in the residence halls.

"You know, when you think about the Virginia Tech situation, that was a student that lived in the building, that lived on campus," Jackson said. "That was internal, so a lot of focus is, 'how do we identify students that are in crisis?'"

Jackson said Housing and Dining Services hires a number of on-site professionals and student staff with experience mediating crisis situations. Residence hall staffs are trained to work with residents, learn about their behaviors and identify any potential problems.

If the text-message system fails, Jackson said he is confident about the multiple emergency systems in place at K-State. Since the Virginia Tech tragedy, the residence halls have increased security measures with door-access systems and late-night check-ins. Jackson said he hopes the extra security measures will make life safer for students.

"A lot of our students aren't familiar with Manhattan, so they are coming into an environment that they don't have a lot of context in," Jackson said. "Consequently, they are asking those kind of questions like, 'Where do I need to go? How do I find the best path to-and-from class? Who are my friends? Who am I going to relate to?'"

"Security is a piece of the puzzle as students learn their way around K-State."

Bill Snyder rejuvenated the thinking of football here, but it's always been considered a basketball school. The University of Kansas, for some reason, always seems to be able to get ballplayers, and I'm sure that's because of the close proximity to Kansas City. We're out here in the plains.

What did you hear about the KU game here?

It was typical. The fans were crazy, and it looked like they played a nice game. I looked at it in the paper the next day. It was a typical KU/K-State game. Now it's back where it should be — at each other like wolves.

"[The sorority] has always been really considerate and makes sure there's something for us to eat," she said. "They're always willing to co-

When it comes to eating out, Killingsworth said most restaurants offer plenty of options for vegetarians and vegans, so it hasn't been too difficult for her to live her life just as normally as she did prior to eating vegetarian.

Higgins said Oriental cuisine restaurants generally offer the most options for those following a vegetarian or vegan diet.

NAACP Chairman to speak Thursday

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julian Bond, chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, will give the keynote lecture for K-State's Black History Month events at 7 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Alumni Center Ballroom.

BOND

Bond will address the nearly century-long history of the NAACP, which has fought for social justice for minorities everywhere. Bond also will review the history of the civil rights movement and the current fight for equal opportunity in America, according to a press release from K-State Media Relations.

Bond's speech will coincide with the Black History Month theme of K-State's Black Student Union, "Raising the Bar: Connecting our Past Progress with our Future Ambitions."

Bryon Williams, president of BSU, said the Rev. Al Sharpton came to K-State in 2004 to promote his presidential bid and Bond will be the next black speaker of his caliber to come to K-State.

"[Bond] was really influential in the civil rights movement — he was there with Dr. King," Williams, senior in economics, said.

Williams said Bond's speech will be relevant to current minority issues in the U.S., like the Jena 6 and Hurricane Katrina.

The civil rights activist will have a question-and-answer session after the lecture. Bond will be available for photos, in the Tointon Great Room in the Alumni Center at a reception following the lecture.

"If you want a first-person account of the civil rights movement, it is definitely the time and place to get it," Williams said.

100-packs might not help people lose weight

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It might come as little surprise that the U.S. has one of the highest obesity rates in the world. In fact, it came in at No. 9 on Forbes' 2007 list of the World's Fattest Countries, citing 74.1 percent of its citizens over the age of 15 as overweight.

"We've got food everywhere," said Mary Meck Higgins, associate professor of human nutrition, "and it's not very expensive, and we don't get much physical activity. I think people realize it's a problem, but I don't know if people understand how to solve it."

Besides getting more exercise and eating more healthily, Higgins said people need to start appropriately portioning their meals.

However, she said she understood that some eating habits are hard to break, like completely cutting out cookies and chips. This is where Nabisco 100-calorie packs, packaged snacks that have exactly 100 calories, and companies with similar products are supposed to come in. But do they really help with portion control, or are they just part of a marketing scheme to monopolize on America's recent health craze?

"A lot of times, people snack on [junk foods] and they're not really paying attention," Higgins said. "They're eating mindlessly, putting their hand up and down and might be watching TV, studying, reading, eating in the car ... and if they had to open package after package to get more than 100 calories, it might enter their consciousness. If you're eating three or four [100-calorie packs], it's a lot easier to realize how much you're actually eating."

But Higgins said it's just as easy to snack on something much healthier that also contains about 100 calories.

She said foods like fresh fruits and vegetables usually come in 100 calorie packages, but people tend not to think of those options because the foods that are advertised are generally unhealthy.

"You don't see a lot of ads for apples or bananas," she said.

Marketing companies recognize this as well as the country's growing concern about its health, said Kevin Gwinner, professor of marketing. So what these companies are trying to do now is keep profits up by making products more appealing by appearing healthier.

According to an ABCnews.com article by Christi Myers, many 100-calorie packs are free of trans fats and low in sugar, but they are still highly processed and should not be confused as a nutritious snack. The article said consumers are also paying much more for this package of much less food.

"With a full bag of pretzels, the cost is about 17 cents an ounce," Myers said in the article. "Divided into 100-calorie packs, the same pretzels cost nearly 40 cents an ounce, more than double."

Gwinner said the way companies like Nabisco are able to raise the price per ounce is by justifying the sale of convenience.

"Rather than making your own 100-[calorie] packs out of Ziploc bags, which you'd also have to pay for, they're doing that for you," he said. "The question is, is it worth it to the consumer? ... What those companies are betting on is that added convenience of packaging the product in that smaller size will be worth enough for the consumer to be able to pay the extra amount."

Nikki Kratzer, freshman in history, said she doesn't mind paying more for the packaging. Kratzer said she tries to remain conscious of her daily calorie intake, and having snacks like 100-calorie packs help her stay on track.

"If you're not paying attention," she said, "then sometimes you go overboard. Foods that are really spelled out for you make it a lot easier."

But Higgins said the best step toward better eating habits and a healthier lifestyle is not by spending more to eat less, but by actively thinking about what kinds of foods and how much of them students are actually eating.

She said to make meal portions on smaller dishes, like saucers, and eat six small meals a day, so that the urge to snack is never even an issue.

VP debate addresses Lafene, safety issues

Matt Castro | COLLEGIAN

Student body vice president candidates covered topics like campus safety and student parking at a debate yesterday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. The debate consisted of previously structured questions followed by a forum open to audience members.

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Campus safety and student parking were some of the topics discussed at the student body vice presidential debate Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. The debate consisted of questions from a moderator and an open session for the audience to ask questions.

With the recent health issues that have affected the K-State student body, such as flu and bronchitis, Lafene Health Center was one of the major topics addressed during the debate.

Candidates Piper Hoskins and Robert Swift agreed that Lafene has room for improvement as far as serving K-State.

"We definitely feel that Lafene needs to be evaluated," Swift, junior in political science, said. Swift said Lafene serves many students well, but he and his running mate would like to see a few things change.

Sen. proposes 3 strikes legislation

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The baseball phrase "three strikes and you're out" might soon apply to anyone charged with committing three or more felonies in the state of Kansas. Sen. Derek Schmidt has proposed legislation that would prevent repeat offenders of nonviolent crimes from receiving bail.

"The problem we're trying to fix is repeat property offenders," said Schmidt, a Republican from Independence. "In Kansas, we've done a very good job of moving violent offenders up on the priority list in terms of prison space. The state has consistently moved property violators lower. It can be very difficult for Kansans to go to prison for property theft, and a lot of people who commit those crimes know that it's a hole in the system. I think most Kansans are shocked when they find that a person can be convicted time and time again of a felony and never go to prison."

Schmidt said the legislation is being considered in a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee.

This proposal differs greatly from traditional three strikes legislation, said Ryan Spohn, assistant professor of sociology. The most basic model is the one used in California, which often sentences individuals to a life prison term and can create a heavy burden on the prison system.

"What [Schmidt's] trying to do is say that upon the third property felony, probation is not an option," Spohn said. "It's shifting discretion away from judges, and decisions will be made by the legislature. The sentencing judge will know a lot more about the specific case, so you are losing out on the knowledge and experience of a sentencing judge when you pass a mandatory sentencing bill like this."

Several other concerns, including prison space, have also come up during the legislative process.

Schmidt said he believes his proposition will simply require some balance.

"I think it has a lot of support. The difficulty is, of course, that it requires a lot of prison space and that's why we got into this box in the first place," he said. "The legislature has been unwilling to provide the amount of space required to enforce this law. It's going to be a balance between real consequence and willingness to pay for additional prisoner capacity."

Schmidt said there are approximately 400 unfilled prison beds throughout Kansas. He also said that permission has been granted to expand the El Dorado Correctional Facility, in El Dorado, Kan., if needed.

"There is room available now and authority to add room," Schmidt said. "We think that makes this the perfect time to consider."

Spohn said he still was concerned about the legislation.

"Are prisons intended for property offenders or dangerous offenders?" Spohn said. "What Schmidt is believing here is that this is a harsh punishment and that this will serve as a deterrent, but if you take a property offender and throw them in prison with a bunch of violent offenders, what is going to happen? It's not very likely to make them a better person. What would Schmidt suggest to integrate this person back into society?"

Though Schmidt said there is enough room in prisons and believes this legislation would deter property offenders from repeatedly committing offenses, some still believe there is more work to do when finalizing this proposal.

RCPD blames population growth for crime rate increase

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County crime rates have increased over the past few years, according to the U.S. Justice Department Bureau of Justice Statistics.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said Manhattan has lower crime rates compared to other cities with similar populations.

According to the BJS, Manhattan does not have the lowest among the nation's crime rates, but it is significantly less than others.

Moldrup said the crime rate has increased over the past few years because of population increases and Manhattan becoming more of an attraction for surrounding communities.

"There's more people around," Moldrup said. "Anytime you have more people, you are going to have more victims."

Moldrup said the RCPD has responded to the increase of crime by increasing the size of its force, becoming more involved with the community and increasing the number of officers involved with Problem Oriented Policing.

POP is designed to get the community members involved in their neighborhoods with neighborhood watch programs.

Police also educate residents on ways they can help protect their neighborhoods.

"[The RCPD] is not just trying to be reactive, but proactive," Moldrup said. "We have been trying to get the community involved."

RCPD director Bradley Schoen announced a Citizen's Police Academy for any interested community members during a Law Board meeting Tuesday afternoon. Schoen said anyone who wants to participate should contact the RCPD.

While the board reviewed the fourth-quarter crime statistics, Al Johnson, Law Board chairman, asked about the significant increase in auto accidents in 2007.

Johnson also raised concern about the increase in auto thefts and inquired as to whether there was a possible auto-theft ring in Manhattan.

RCPD Capt. Jeff Hooper said 71 of the accidents were weather-related.

As for the possibility of an auto-theft ring, all but three vehicles have been recovered.

The recovered vehicles showed no signs of stolen parts as evidence of theft-ring involvement.

County Attorney Barry Wilkerson prosecuted 1,162 criminal cases in 2006 and 1,183 cases in 2007.

Wilkerson said the number of cases prosecuted partially has to do with the increase of population, but more because of the age group that has joined the community.

"In the population of 18- to 26-year-olds, you see a lot of bad judgment used," Wilkerson said. "People [between 18 and 26] make themselves more vulnerable to criminal activity."

Wilkerson said drug abuse and binge drinking among this age group is a problem in Manhattan. In a study Wilkerson performed by looking at court cases from 1990 to 1998, he said 88 percent of the cases involving violent crimes, such as rape and murder, drugs or alcohol were involved.

"My impression is there has been an increase in drug and alcohol abuse," Wilkerson said. "The abuse has contributed to the increase in crime."

Along with violent crime, Wilkerson said property crime involves drugs and alcohol.

Unemployed addicts are more likely to steal to obtain money to support their drug habit.

Wilkerson said the county attorney's office is trying to target prevention programs in school along with prosecuting the drug dealers first. He also said he prefers rehabilitation for those individuals addicted to drugs.

"Last August I prosecuted a man with 17 prior [drug-related] convictions," Wilkerson said. "I am trying to prosecute individuals peddling poison and get them off the streets."

Wilkerson said the man received a 16-year prison sentence for the production of methamphetamines and drug trafficking.

Illusion of safety

Gun-free zones do not prevent firearm violence

Gun-free zones have been used to give the illusion of security and safety for many years in the United States and across the world.

In 1938, Adolf Hitler forced Germany to become one of the largest gun-free zones the world had seen. According to the Nazi Weapon Law of 1938, German citizens were not allowed to possess firearms unless they were authorized by the police force or in military service.

By 1945, the Nazi government slaughtered more than six million Jews, gypsies and mentally retarded or otherwise disabled individuals. Last week, we were reminded once again of the "success" that gun-free zones have had in providing security and safety to students.

According to the New York Times on Feb. 15, Steven Kazmierczak entered Cole Hall at Northern Illinois University with a shotgun concealed in a guitar case and three other handguns.

Beginning his assault at 3:06 p.m., Kazmierczak had enough time to reload and continue to fire upon students in the large lecture hall before campus security entered the building.

This shooting has reminded many in the U.S. of the shootings last year on the Virginia Tech campus. These shootings, like all school shootings, have had one common denominator — each has occurred in a gun-free zone.

Knee-jerk responses to school shootings include more restrictions on firearms and tougher policies to keep weapons off campus, but current policies were already violated prior to the shooting.

According to Northern Illinois University's Student Code of Conduct, effective Aug. 8, 2006, firearms are not allowed to be brought onto campus without "written consent of the chief security officer of the university." The policies are only as strong as the paper they are written on. With the slow response by campus police in both occasions, there is little for students to do to defend themselves.

Gun-free zones of the past and present have only one meaning — civilians are unable to defend themselves in times of emergency.

Currently on our own campus, the only solution the Student Government Association and the administration has provided to keep us safe is the ability to send text-message alerts in case of an emergency.

But the alerts provide no benefit to those caught in an emergency situation and can only be preventative to those outside of the situation.

In a grassroots movement, students at universities across this country have been pushing for changes in gun-control laws to allow students who have obtained a conceal-and-carry permit to carry their weapons on campus.

Prior to the shooting at Virginia Tech last year, the Virginia General Assembly would not let a bill out of subcommittee that allowed students to carry concealed weapons on campus.

After the bill was defeated, Virginia Tech spokesman Larry Hinckler said to the Roanoke Times, "I'm sure the university community is appreciative of the General Assembly's actions because this will help parents, students, faculty and visitors feel safe on our campus."

Contrary to public opinion, eliminating the "gun-free zone" on campus will not lead to shootouts or put a gun in the hands of every student.

With previous countermeasures failing time after time when it comes to preventing school shootings, the only solution is to allow those in our state who have obtained a conceal-and-carry permit to have the option of carrying firearms on campus.

TO THE POINT

Legislation targets wrong criminals

A Kansas legislator has proposed a bill that would remove the option of bail for any Kansas who commits three or more felonies, basically forcing them to serve the full allotted term.

Sen. Derek Schmidt, R-Independence, said the bill is supposed to target property offenders who habitually burglarize and vandalize houses and other property.

We question the motives behind this legislation. Jails have little room for inmates, which could be used for more violent criminals.

Who would you rather have enter jail without bail, a first-time rapist or a person who has stolen a few televisions and some jewelry on three separate occasions?

Once these three-time property offenders are thrown into jail, they would be lumped in with rapists, murderers and other violent offenders because of the lack of space. What's going to happen when they meet these violent individuals? Will they really learn from their past mistakes and turn into upstanding citizens?

Legislators need to differentiate between the seriousness of property crimes and violent crimes.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

African crises ignored by U.S., other countries

Since Sept. 11, 2001, the United States has made a pledge to combat terrorism around the world and make the future safe for democracy. In recent years, the country has made significant efforts toward this aim in places like Afghanistan and Iraq. Such situations are not perfect, but progress has been made.

However, if U.S. citizens look farther south and west, they will see a rather depressing sight on the continent of Africa. I know — no big surprise. Of course, just saying those three words is a problem in and of itself.

For the past few weeks, Kenya has been overwhelmed with turmoil following a disputed election in December 2007. On Feb. 13, the Associated Press reported that ethnic violence has resulted in the deaths of 1,000 people and the exodus of 600,000 Kenyan refugees. Fortunately, Kenya's political rivals agreed to sign a deal last week to end the violence.

Elsewhere, the former French colony of Chad has seen better days.

On Feb. 14, the Associated Press reported Chad's government declared a state of emergency after battling rebels since the beginning of the month. The article stated that 160 people were killed in the fighting at the beginning of February.

But the question is this: With all this violence in Kenya and Chad in 2008, how is the world reacting?

Answer: by reviewing the situation at a typically slow pace. Over the years, it has become apparent that Africa has been outrageously shafted in its most desperate times of need. To start, let's look at Rwanda in 1994. It is no longer a secret that the world turned the other way as thousands of Tutsis were slaughtered by the Hutu government. After 100 days of senseless butchery, the genocide ended with more than 800,000 dead.

The saddest part: The story did not end there.

The fallout from the genocide affected neighboring Zaire, now known as Congo. In 1998, the country plunged into a war fought between not only Hutu and Tutsi factions, but 25 other armed groups, along with eight African nations. This war lasted from 1998 to 2003, killing an estimated five million people. Worse yet, as Congo experienced what some have called Africa's World War, the rest of the world looked beyond the situation.

Unfortunately, the suffering has not yet ended. On Jan. 22, an article in Reuters explained how war, disease and malnutrition kill roughly 45,000 people every month in Congo. Africa's World War ended in 2003, but the fallout continues to claim lives to this day.

Yes, like anyone else, I did not find out about this until just recently, which is appalling.

Bottom line: Five days after Sept. 11, President Bush addressed the nation, saying that it was the responsibility of the U.S. to "rid the world of evil." I don't think that is a bad objective.

However, if one is to make such a bold claim, this person better take action in the parts of the world that really need to be rid of evil. Like a ripple in a calm pond, neglected pain spreads throughout the world in one form or another.

In this case, if world leaders want to make the world safe for democracy, Africa is where they must truly start.

Rob's mom is hot.

I just want to feel the weight of a man on top of me.

I just rode the bull at Wal-Mart, and I had to get off.

Seriously, am I the only person in this town that sees all these freakin' crows?

If you were sex, I'd marry you.

To the person who lost their cat: I accidentally hit it.

I just heard two girls say "WTF" because there's now more than one candidate for student body president. Whatever happened to choice in a democracy?

Who decided Catholics can't eat meat on Fridays? Because I don't think it was Jesus.

To the guy running in the afternoon with little, tiny shorts on and no shirt. Are you crazy?

To the guy who lost his sandals in my yard back in August: They're still there.

Sorry, Moore 2. Moore 3 just knows how to party.

Who the heck reserves a room in Marlatt for next year?

I just saw a Chi Omega get out of her car and fart. Nice.

I did not pay hundreds of dollars to sit in a history class where a guy in the front row constantly talks during lectures.

Tootsie Rolls make me salivate.

Red means stop, green means go and purple means Wednesday. I stand firm on that one.

Is this my test grade or my shoe size?

If I eat SunChips, will that make spring come faster?

To the hot guy that works at Dillon's in the produce: Can I stock your fruit?

Brad puts the "a" in stupid.

Forget all this Beasley and Walker talk. I want me some Luis Colon.

Matt Combes: If you have to end in a Salt-N-Pepa song, don't even bother to publish it.

So I'm pretty excited. I just found out they make root beer floats in a bottle. All I'm waiting for is crack in a bottle.

If you see a man on campus with a mustache, his name is Calvin.

Whenever I see moms leave their babies in their car, I like to mess around and tell them that someone is stealing their baby. It's funny until they start crying. Then it's just annoying.

Seriously, who burns cookies in the microwave?

Do you think if Bill Walker's real name was Bill Runner, he would run on defense?

CITY COMMISSION

City sells Manhattan Town Center

City Commission agreed to sell Manhattan Town Center to UrbanCal Manhattan Town Center, the current mall management group, at Tuesday night's City Commission meeting.

The city will receive 18 percent of the net profits. The city's share will equate to about $2.6 million. The provisions for the city receiving these profits comes from a re-negotiation of a lease agreement that occurred in 1992, said City Attorney William Frost. Frost said many Manhattan citizens heavily criticized the commission for re-negotiating the mall lease in 1992.

City Commission also honored Deborah Nauwerth for receiving the 2008 Kansas Master Teacher Award. Mayor Tom Phillips declared Feb. 27, 2008 Deborah Nauwerth Day in recognition of the hard work and dedication she has shown in teaching children in Kansas.

"Right now in education, [teachers] are at a time of high accountability," Nauwerth said. "Take time on Feb. 27 to thank a teacher for all their hard work and dedication."

Phillips also announced the city of Manhattan has joined ONE, a nationwide campaign run by a nonprofit organization dedicated to fighting extreme poverty in the poorest areas around the world like Africa.

In another agenda item, Commissioner Bob Strawn recommended the commission change the way the city purchases vehicles.

The city currently allows city dealers to present bids for vehicles purchases, but the city accepts the lowest bid regardless of where the dealer is located. Strawn recommended the commission give preference to local dealers for the purchase of city-owned vehicles to help keep the economy strong in the Manhattan and surrounding community.

The commission, after much deliberation, also tabled the decision to accept the Prairie Lakes land offer because of many unanswered concerns in the proposal. The item will be tabled for 60 days so the commission can further investigate advantages and disadvantages of acquiring the land.

Uncommon total lunar eclipse to take place Wednesday evening

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's not every day people see the moon turn reddish-orange and turquoise. But tonight, it will be a sight to see.

At about 9:30 p.m., a total lunar eclipse will be visible from Manhattan. It will last for three and a half hours, and the moon will be completely covered by the Earth's shadow for 50 minutes of that time, according to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Web site.

The total lunar eclipse will be visible from South America and most of North America on Feb. 20, and from Western Europe, Africa and Western Asia on Feb. 21, according to NASA.

Bharat Ratna, professor of physics, said a lunar eclipse occurs when the Earth comes between the sun and the moon, blocking sunlight and casting its shadow on the Moon.

There must be a full moon for a lunar eclipse to happen, Ratna said, but a lunar eclipse cannot occur every time there is a full moon. The moon's orbit around the Earth and the Earth's orbit around the sun (called the ecliptic) must be aligned on the line of nodes. Ratna said a total lunar eclipse only occurs every few years. The next one will be in December 2010.

The Earth's shadow is comprised of two cone-shaped parts, according to the NASA Web site. The penumbra is the outer shadow, which blocks some but not all of the sun's rays. The inner shadow is called the "umbra." It blocks all sunlight from reaching the moon during a lunar eclipse.

A partial eclipse occurs if only part of the moon passes through the umbra. If the entire moon passes through Earth's inner shadow, there is a total eclipse, like the one occurring tonight, according to NASA. The moon's color during a total eclipse can appear bright orange, blood red, or dark brown. On rare occasions, it turns very dark gray, according to the NASA site.

Ratna said the moon's color during an eclipse is caused by sunlight passing through the Earth's atmosphere. The atmosphere scatters the blue light and allows only reddish light to reach the moon. At the beginning and end of the eclipse, the moon appears blue or turquoise.

Ratna said that the ancient Greeks first recognized eclipses in about 300 B.C. Aristarchus discovered that the Earth was a sphere by observing its shadow on the moon during eclipses around this time.

"He played a big role in setting up early Greek solar systems and sizes," Ratna said.

Kings would use eclipses to their own advantage by employing astronomers to predict when they would occur in ancient times, Ratna said. The rulers would then make their subjects think they were powerful enough to block out the moon single-handedly.

The North Central Kansas Astronomical Society is meeting at 7:30 tonight on the south side of Cardwell Hall to watch the lunar eclipse. The group will provide telescopes for people to use and suggests observers also bring binoculars and dress appropriately. If weather permits, people might also be able to see Saturn and Mars, according to the NCKAS flyer. NCKAS will update its Web site, www.nckas.org, throughout the day with weather and cancellation information.

A total lunar eclipse occurs when the Earth comes between the Moon and the Sun and casts its shadow on the Moon. One will occur this Wednesday. # Throwing for victory

Senior weight-thrower Loren Groves automatically qualified for the NCAA Indoor Championships during the Wildcat Invitational Jan. 19. Groves is the reigning Big 12 Champion in the women's weight throw and holds the K-State record in the event.

Groves breaks records, earns qualifying throw for NCAA

Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With one toss, sophomore Loren Groves broke the K-State weight-throw record, earned an automatic qualifying mark for the NCAA championships and recorded the second-best throw in the nation this season.

Groves' throw in the Wildcat Invitational on Jan. 19 beat the previous school record by nine inches with a distance of 69-11.50.

"I could tell when I released it that it had a good arch on it; it had a lot of speed on it, and it was going to be the one to break the record," Groves said.

As well as being the K-State record holder, Groves is the reigning Big 12 Conference champion in the weight throw, making her one of the favorites in this season's Big 12 Championships, on Feb. 29 in Lincoln, Neb. She won the conference meet last year with a throw of 67-10.75.

"I feel good going in," Groves said. "I've had a couple of rough meets, but we've been working on some things to get my technique down."

She said she has been working on planting her foot on her third rotation and releasing at the right point.

Assistant coach Steve Fritz said he has not been surprised by Groves' success and expects her to compete well at the conference meet.

"She's been mostly consistent over the season," Fritz said. "We had a little hiccup a couple of weeks ago in the meet at Air Force, but she's been very consistent in work-outs all year long. I would expect her to continue to throw around what she is capable of."

Groves, who never competed in the weight throw until she came to K-State, also competes in the hammer throw and the discus during the outdoor season. She even ran the hurdles in high school, which she said has helped her succeed at K-State.

"Growing up, I was a hurdler," Groves said. "I think my speed from the hurdles helped me transfer over to the hammer and weight, and I just had to gain strength. The weight program is great. It helped beef me up so I could still keep my speed so I can do well in the weight [throw]."

Fritz credits Groves' success to her athleticism, her ability to avoid injuries and her willingness to learn quickly.

"Some people come in and struggle their first year or two and then take off," Fritz said. "Others come in and it becomes natural movement to them right away. For Loren, it was

Prank could distract angry fans

There was baseball news this week that, for a nice change of pace, didn't involve syringes, conspiracies or testimonies on Capitol Hill. Needless to say, this could not have come at a better time for Major League Baseball, which is in a struggle to salvage any bit of self-respect it can.

JOE BERGKAMP

Kyle Kendrick, pitcher for the Philadelphia Phillies, was duped by his teammates — most notably fellow pitching staff member Brett Myers, manager Charlie Manuel, Kendrick's agent and the media present in the clubhouse — into believing that he had been traded to the Giants. The Yomiuri Giants of Japan, that is.

The video of Manuel telling Kendrick is circulating on YouTube.com and is certainly worth checking out. In the Internet video, you can see shock and confusion spread across the 23-year-old left-hander's face when he hears the false news. It isn't until Kendrick is addressed by the media that the joke is over.

During the stunt, a fake contract was signed, travel plans were set and Kendrick was informed he was being traded for a fictional Japanese pitcher who shares the same name as the former world champion hot dog eating champion Kobayashi. Teammate Myers is being credited with setting the whole sham up. He said Kendrick was picked because he was gullible enough to fall for it.

Some might say the joke is in bad taste and is a terrible joke to play on a young professional who is trying to make a name for himself early in his career, but as anyone who's ever played organized sports knows, it's all part of clubhouse shenanigans.

This practical joke just might have come at the perfect time for professional baseball. Right now you can't read about pro baseball without being inundated with the Mitchell Report, HGH and the possible charges of perjury by some of baseball's biggest names. Certainly, none of these shed a good light on the sport. Whether baseball is able to recover and repair its reputation is still up in the air, but it's nice to see there is still some good, light-hearted fun to report.

BOSU gaining favor as a new fitness phenomenon

Are you looking for a new way to work out, or do you want to try a new piece of equipment? Is running in circles on the indoor track for your cardio workout leaving you bored and unmotivated? Is doing the same old crunches and abdominal exercises leaving you with minimal results?

KENDALL HALL

There is a new alternative being offered for free at the Peters Recreation Complex: BOSU classes. The fact that it's free might have piqued your interest, but now you might be asking, "What is BOSU?"

BOSU stands for Both Sides Utilized and it's a relatively new fitness phenomenon. What started out as just a new piece of equipment has turned into an entirely new way to train your body. BOSU focuses on a more mindful workout, keeping the participant focused and training them to become more aware of muscle movements.

The BOSU ball looks like half of a resist-a-ball with a platform bottom. Like the name suggests, it can be used with the platform side down or, for more of a challenge, with the ball half on the ground. Skiers and other sports enthusiasts have been using the BOSU to train in the off-season or as preparation for events for a few years now, but the general population can gain great fitness benefits from the BOSU as well.

The BOSU is an appropriate tool for people of any age or fitness level. It can be used as a cardiovascular workout, a balance training tool, a flexibility training tool or in place of a bench during strength training exercises.

The BOSU has numerous functional training benefits for older adults as well. Becky Cortez, a certified fitness professional who writes for FitnessForHealth.com, wrote an article called "Jump on It," which discusses the benefits of this workout.

"Functional training not only refers to sports specif-

Stewart family releases letter to thank fans

The family of senior guard Clint Stewart released the following open letter addressing the support they received after the passing of Stewart's mother, Vanessa, on Feb. 5:

"Clint Sr., Clint Jr. and LaTori would like to offer our sincere thanks to everyone who has supported the family during our time of bereavement.

"To the Kansas State University family — 'Thank You' simply isn't enough. Some of the best moments Vanessa had as she fought to stay with us were at KSU. She enjoyed the trips to Manhattan.

She knew that there she would be able to set sickness aside, even if only for a short while. There she was allowed to cheer for her son and his 'brothers from other mothers,' and be a fan. Thank you for giving her those moments. She will be front row forever. Go Cats!

"To anyone we failed to mention — please blame it on our heads and not our hearts. We sincerely appreciate all the kind words, deeds, thoughts, prayers, meals, and other acts of kindness offered on our behalf as we have grieved.

"This new journey will be difficult, but we are certain that with the determination Vanessa taught us and your support, we will be able to greet each new day and the challenges it holds with the strength to make it through.

"Again, Sincere Thanks and Much Love,
The Stewart Family"

NCAA closes K-State football investigation

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The NCAA's investigation into the K-State football program has ceased without finding any rules violations.

"We are obviously quite pleased with the NCAA's decision," said athletic director Tim Weiser in a press release. "We diligently worked with the NCAA on this matter and cooperated fully with the enforcement staff. We are happy that it is now concluded."

The investigation started in October after K-State self-reported that it had possibly violated NCAA rules. University officials also conducted their own investigation into the situation.

The possible violation centered around five football players (three former, two 2007 squad members) and a former university employee.

"I have always maintained that we have never, nor will we ever, tolerate intentional violations of NCAA rules," Weiser said. "We have the highest regard for compliance with the rules. I would like to thank members of the faculty and those of our athletics staff who played an integral part in this process and helped bring about this satisfactory conclusion."

AMC drama shows dark, internal side of freedom

"Breaking Bad"

★★★★★

Review by Scott Girard

With the emergence of TV shows that portray adults selling and growing drugs out of necessity, "Breaking Bad" takes the genre to a more twisted, in-your-face level.

The AMC series revolves around Walter White, played by Bryan Cranston (the dad from "Malcolm in the Middle"), who is a 50-year-old chemistry teacher with a child on the way and recently diagnosed lung cancer. He has little time to live and needs money to leave his wife, high school son and unborn child.

After accompanying his Drug Enforcement Agency agent brother-in-law for a meth drug bust, Walter looks into the drug making process, eventually joining up with a former student, and begins to cook and sell meth.

The unlikely pair buy a trailer and take it to a remote area in the desert to make the meth crystals, which are extremely pure because of Walter's vast knowledge of chemistry.

After Walter's partner, Jesse Pinkman, played by Aaron Paul, runs into his old partner that he ratted out, Pinkman leads his ex-partner and his friend to the trailer where Walter kills them with a deadly chemical. All of this happens in the pilot episode.

The next three episodes delve into the motives, struggles and inner thoughts of Walter and Pinkman, and they also answer the questions of what the partners do with the bodies, whether or not they continue making meth and how the family reacts to Walter's cancer.

Above all, the series revolves around Walter coming to terms with his cancer and his gradual move toward emotional freedom, whether it is beating up a bully who is making fun of his son who has cerebral palsy or blowing up a irritating, snobbish businessman's new car. Every risk Walter takes releases him from the inward, quiet demeanor he displayed as a teacher and father before the cancer diagnosis. When Pinkman asks Walter why he decided to make meth, Walter says, "It makes me feel free."

Though award-winning Showtime series "Weeds" mixes a solid dose of adult humor with the struggles of parenting, "Breaking Bad" shows the emotional toll cancer and drug dealing can take on a family — both Walter's and later Pinkman's.

Unlike "Weeds," where a recently widowed mom picks up marijuana distribution to maintain her suburban, cookie-cutter lifestyle, Walter has few options; he is dying. As a high school teacher, he has little money to leave to his family — there are no scandalous affairs or inept uncles like "Weeds."

In each of the three episodes after the pilot, more is revealed about the two main characters, giving the audience background and an understanding of their actions. It is also interesting to see the transformation of Walter and Pinkman. Walter's cancer is obviously a burden to him and his family, but it also removes many of the previous restraints that held him back. In Pinkman's case, he gradually begins to realize the consequences of his actions and tries to seek help from his parents.

"Breaking Bad" is a true drama that addresses complicated issues like choosing family over the law, living a shortened life to the fullest while producing and selling debilitating drugs.

The show airs at 9 p.m. on Sundays, and the fifth episode will premiere this Sunday. Most of the episodes and summaries are posted on the AMC Web site, so people who have not seen them can catch up before the new episode airs.

Students travel for fun, to study, to provide aid for break

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring break means different thoughts and activities to different people. It can be a break from class, a break from work or simply a break from Manhattan.

Whether students are experiencing their first college spring break or embracing their last, there are a variety of options to choose from to fill the weeklong rest.

VOLUNTEER WORK

K-State offers a way for students to travel and help other communities through the alternative break program in the civic leadership office of Leadership Studies and Programs.

Kim Frazier, who works with K-State's AmeriCorps VISTA program, said the alternative break program is open to all K-State students. There are several locations and activities available, like rebuilding houses in Greensburg, Kan., working with the Boys and Girls Club in Chicago, and working on a trail in La Follette, Tenn. There are also programs in New Orleans and Dallas.

Most trips cost $175, which covers travel, housing and most meal expenses, Frazier said. Trips to Greensburg cost $125.

"From a student's perspective, it's a cheap option," Frazier said. "For an entire week, you couldn't necessarily stay at home for $200. It's also fun, and you can meet a lot of people and do community service and help communities outside of Manhattan."

She said about 40 students will go to New Orleans, about 35 will work in Greensburg and other sites will have about 10 students.

Monica Parrish, special assistant for Leadership Studies and Programs, said the deadline to apply for the alternative break program was Feb. 15, but the deadline is not "hard and fast."

"Basically, we have 'X' amount of spots to fill," she said. "If we don't get enough applications by then, we'll keep recruiting. Generally in the past, it's worked out pretty even, with some negotiating room."

Frazier said applications can be found on the Leadership Studies and Programs Web site, and completed and turned in to the civic leadership office in the Foundation Center or e-mailed to kfrazier@ksu.edu.

GROUP PLANS

Tara Marsh, Jade Travel consultant, said popular places for students to travel to this year is Cancun and Jamaica.

However, Marsh said students should start finalizing their plans and buying their plane tickets for spring break trips before Christmas. She said she has looked at cruises for groups and families, and spots are filling quickly.

For students who have not made plans yet, Marsh said there is still time, and students should look to avoid high airfare costs.

"At this point, any place they can drive to is good," she said, "like Padre. It's probably the most popular because it's the party atmosphere."

If they want to go on a cruise, they could drive to Galveston [Texas].

Marsh also said students can drive somewhere to go skiing.

She said if students want to stay close for break, they could go to a lake in Missouri if the weather is nice enough.

"But I haven't had any calls for anybody going somewhere in Kansas," she said.

Marsh said Jade Travel, 315 Poyntz Ave., has access to different search engines and companies that offer spring break trips, and the travel consultants can help students find discounts on group sizes or other details.

"We can handle all the payments and documents and everything that is needed," she said.

TRIPS ABROAD

Liz Ward, director of study abroad programs, said studying abroad is also an option for students during spring break.

"It's a short period of time," Ward said. "So, typically faculty-led programs are the most popular."

She said the programs offered during the break vary each year in their academic content and countries.

Ward said many students who study abroad during spring break later decide to study abroad for a longer period of time.

Ward said students usually apply for the spring break programs in the spring semester.

According to the Office of International Programs Web site, there are two faculty-led programs planned for spring break.

For one of the trips students can receive credit for Modern Political Thought while traveling around Prague, Czech Republic, and the other trip covers European literature while traveling Europe.

DAY-LEWIS, CHRISTIE NO LONGER LOCKS

LOS ANGELES — For weeks, Britons Daniel Day-Lewis and Julie Christie have looked like sure bets to win the coveted best actor and actress Academy Awards, but in the days ahead of Sunday's gala ceremony, momentum has shifted.

Hollywood enjoys surprises on the movie industry's most prestigious night, and pundits think popular actor George Clooney and little-known French actress Marion Cotillard would be wise to start practicing their acceptance speeches.

"There is no such thing as a shoo-in at the Oscars. Hollywood is a town of bull-headed, contrary-minded people," said Tom O'Neil, columnist for www.TheEnvelope.com.

Day-Lewis, 50, an actor known for lengthy preparation, is well-liked by Academy voters. He won an Oscar playing a man who overcomes cerebral palsy in 1989's "My Left Foot," and has been nominated two other times for "In the Name of the Father" and "Gangs of New York."

KING'S KITCHEN

Stew could warm remaining winter months

The groundhog saw his shadow Feb. 2, and now we are all supposedly going to endure another four weeks of winter. With cold temperatures, students need a nice warm meal to come home to.

BRETT KING

Spring is the start of grilling season, but it's hard to make space in the freezer when it is already stuffed full with other cuts of meat. A good hardy stew is one of the easiest ways help clean out

INGREDIENTS:

2 pounds stew meat (beef, venison or other game meat), cubed
4 potatoes

DIRECTIONS:

If one does not already have pre-cubed stew meat, cut chunks of meat into one-inch cubes and place at the bottom of a slow cooker. Cut potatoes into small one-inch pieces and add

1 large yellow onion
3 celery stalks
3 carrots
½ tablespoon salt
½ tablespoon pepper

as the next layer.

The yellow onion should be cut into eighths, broken apart by each layer, and set aside in a large bowl. Dice celery stalks and carrots a quarter of an inch thick, and place in bowl with onions. Add salt, pepper, sugar, rosemary and thyme to the large bowl. Stir with a spoon until spices coat all of the vegetables. Pour the vegetable mixture into the slow cooker on top of potatoes and

HEARTY STEW

1 tablespoon fresh rosemary
1 tablespoon fresh thyme
1 can low sodium beef broth meat.

Pour beef broth into slow cooker and add the bay leaf. Let it cook for eight hours on low, or until potatoes are tender; stir every few hours.

those freezers.

The wonderful thing about stew is that everyone has a different stew recipe. Some will use cubed stew meat, while others will cut their own meat from steaks or tenderloins.

My personal favorite is to use left-over chunks of venison back straps after cutting out fillets.

Using a slow cooker allows all the flavors of the stew to intermingle.

Sheri Smith, assistant professor in regional landscape architecture and community planning, is part of the regional and community planning program faculty as the only African-American woman.

Professor says teaching can be awkward, awarding

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Sheri Smith sits in the K-State Student Union, comfortably sipping her coffee and casually waving at students she recognizes from her classes. Occasionally, a student will address her or she will call out to someone, possibly to check progress on a project.

Her laid-back approach comes naturally, but her interactions with students are not always easy. Smith said there are times when teaching can be uncomfortable for her as an African-American.

"Sometimes I have 134 students and not a minority in the class — but me," she said. "I think sometimes it's awkward. It's awkward for the students, it's awkward for me. I've handled it differently over my time here, and it was a lot harder when I first started."

Smith is an associate professor of landscape architecture/ regional and community planning. She is part of the regional and community planning faculty program where she is also a minority, being the only black person and the only female.

While teaching, Smith said she has encountered situations where she has had to stop and tell the class that derogatory terms cannot be used in papers or else they would be kicked out of the class.

"I try to create an environment where we can say and talk about anything, because these are the issues you're going to deal with when you get out there with the public, but there's a way to do it respectfully," she said.

Smith said students don't always know what they can and can't say in class discussions, and there are also students who know what they should not say but test the teacher.

"The students haven't changed," she said, referring to her six years of teaching experience at K-State. "I usually have an issue at least once a year. It's not overt, but in my response, I've become a little more comfortable."

Smith said she enjoys teaching for the moments when students acknowledge something they have learned from her.

"I always tell students that the things that I teach them now, they might not see the applicability, but I'm teaching them for the future," she said. "But every once in a while you get a student that gets it."

Smith teaches classes where students complete planning projects, and she said she likes to challenge students and is excited when they discover something new.

Smith is an urban planner by profession, and before getting her doctorate, she

Women have not yet achieved equal status in U.S. let alone world

Editor,

I was shocked to read Aubree Casper's column on Monday. I read it several times to make sure I wasn't hallucinating. The idea that feminism is no longer relevant in the United States is very, very wrong. Any student at this university with a basic women's studies course could tell you that women have not achieved equality. According to the most recent U.S. Census, American women are still only earning 77 cents for every dollar men earn. Women are being taught with gendered terms and with textbooks that highlight the achievements of men. Women are warned to stay indoors at night for fear of bodily harm. Children are raised and gendered to believe they should do certain kinds of things because of their sex. It is extremely unlikely that this will be fixed in 30 years like Casper claims. She suggests that feminism should "liberate women worldwide." As much as the United States likes to ignore our own country and try to fix every one around us, perhaps we should first take the plank out of our own eye.

DEBATE | VPs vow few tuition hikes

"We want to do the things we can do and the changes we can make to make Lafene run more efficiently," he said.

Hoskins, junior in economics, said to improve the operation of Lafene, it is important to open the communication lines between students and doctors.

"If you have an issue, you should be able to talk to a doctor," she said.

Dane Miller, junior in political science, had a different stance on the issue.

"You get what you pay for," he said.

Miller encouraged students to realize Lafene's services are free and to be understanding during this time of year when there have been a large number of illnesses at K-State.

Candidates also discussed maintenance problems, environmental issues and increased tuition. Every candidate assured students that they will do all they can to reduce the chances of tuition being increased.

Each candidate was different in regards to their platforms and approaches.

Opponents Nicholas "Ninja" Birdsong and "First-Mate" [Scott] Carlson used each other's campaign to bring out the positive in their own.

"It is important to take care of the pirate menace," said Birdsong, junior in political science.

In response, Carlson, junior in electrical engineering, said he and his running mate are ready to deal with the invasion problem of the ninjas here on campus.

In closing, the candidates were given an opportunity to give final remarks and closing statements to encourage students to visit their Web sites and contact them with whatever issues they think should be addressed.

Swift closed by encouraging students to evaluate their vote by who has the ability to make an effect here at K-State.

"Who's going to be effective when they take the position?" he asked.

The student body presidential debate will be broadcast live on KSDB-FM 91.9 at noon today in the Union Courtyard.

FITNESS | BOSU offers change-up

muscles, neuromuscular and sensory training, which help you in everyday living, and athletic training. From a broader perspective, the stronger demands you put on your muscles, the more they respond and perform. As we age, we lose muscle mass. With the BOSU you gain muscle mass by using your body weight to balance on an unstable surface, calling on more muscles for support and strength."

Cortez goes on to explain that after training on a BOSU, users have increased reflexes and balance and therefore better coordination during everyday activities. Actress Eva Longoria has also been quoted in magazines as saying that the BOSU has "changed the shape of her abs."

Typically, the first half-hour of the class is devoted to a cardiovascular workout. This involves stepping, running, bouncing, squatting and many other moves to get your heart pumping. During this time, your core muscles are working to stabilize your body.

The second half of class is dedicated to toning. Hand weights are used along with the BOSU to hit every major muscle group. Modifications are offered for every fitness level, as with all classes offered at the Rec. Finally, the hour is finished with a series of stretches to enhance flexibility, all while using the BOSU ball.

If the group fitness scene isn't for you, trainers at the Rec Complex can integrate the BOSU into client workouts as well. If you want to try the BOSU on your own, a ball is available in the Combatives room upstairs in the rec where yoga classes are typically held.

If for no other reason, try the BOSU just to change your exercise routine. Everyone from the beefiest guy to the most dedicated cardio-junkie can appreciate this strange blue half-ball.

Kendall Hall is a senior in kinesiology and a certified personal trainer at the Peters Recreation Complex. Please send comments to sports@pub.ksu.edu.

SMITH | Teacher plans cities

worked as an urban planner in Chicago and as a regional planner in Tulsa, Okla.

While an undergraduate, Smith said she knew she wanted to be involved in city planning, but she didn't know the name for what she wanted to do.

"I like doing community development work," she said. "I wanted to work in the subsets of cities."

The regional and community planning program is in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, but Smith differentiated between architecture and planning by saying the former is building the city up through the construction of buildings and the latter is building the city out and looking at issues like zoning and transportation.

Though her years of working eventually brought her to K-State, Smith said it is the faculty that have kept her here.

"I work with some good people, not only what they do, but just who they are," she said.

GROVES | Thrower contributed early

pretty natural from the start."

One of the key reasons Groves was able to pick up the weight throw so quickly, Fritz said, because she was not self-conscious about how she looked when she first learned. Fritz said throwers, like Groves, who can put aside how they look while learning progress fast.

Senior Laci Heller said Groves' long arms are an important factor in her success.

"She is able to move fast and is relatively strong, but her arm length just gives her that much more radius from her body, which gives her a huge advantage," Heller said.

Groves and the rest of the Wildcats will have one last chance to tune up before the conference meet when they host the KSU open on Saturday. Heller, who is also competing in the weight throw, and Groves have a chance to finish in the top two in the conference meet, an accomplishment Groves said would be amazing for the pair. After competing in the conference meet, Groves will compete in the NCAA Indoor Championships on March 14-15, in Fayetteville, Ark. She placed sixth in the meet last season, earning All-American honors, and said she wants to keep performing well up to the championships this season.

"I just want to keep building," Groves said. "I would like to throw over 21-meters from here on out."

Sophomore Merriewether achieves success in classroom as well as on court

By Justin Nutter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They spend countless hours in the weight room, on the court and watching game film. But for many college athletes, sports wind up becoming their No. 1 priority, outweighing even academic performance.

However, there is one K-State men's basketball player who not only recognizes that school is important, but he strives to excel in the classroom and also on the court. He knows he is a student-athlete — not an athletic student.

Sophomore guard Chris Merriewether said putting school first has become more of a habit than an obligation.

Before he began his career as a Wildcat, Merriewether was a student at Arlington Country Day School in Jacksonville, Fla., where he accrued several academic honors. He served as president of the National Honor Society and finished his high school career with an outstanding grade point average.

"Weighted, I think it was a 4.68, and unweighted, I think it was about a 3.9," said Merriewether.

His academic performance ranked second in his graduating class, and it led to scholarship offers from several Ivy League schools, including Harvard and Columbia. However, Merriewether said he believed K-State was the right school for him.

"I made the decision to go to K-State because I thought it was best academically and athletically, as a whole," he said. "Coach [Bob] Huggins saw me play at a tournament in Kentucky, and he really liked my playing style. K-State just seemed like the right fit. A lot of people think I followed my teammate here, but that was really a secondary factor."

Merriewether's high school teammate Jason Bennett, a former K-State center, transferred to Tallahassee Community College after the 2006-07 season.

Merriewether, a finance major, said he still isn't sure what he wants to do after he graduates from K-State.

"I think I might want to be a financial advisor, but I'm still not sure," he said. "I just want to be able to help people and make money at the same time."

While Merriewether has been able to maintain a high GPA at the college level, he said it can be difficult — especially during basketball season.

"It's real tough," he said. "Every teacher wants their class to be your No. 1 focus, and the coaches want your focus to be on basketball. It's like a full-time job."

Merriewether has seen action in 21 contests, averaging 10 minutes per game. He said the team's frequent road trips can make it even harder to find time to study.

"College basketball is a lot different than high school basketball because you're always traveling," he said. "I try to go to the library after practice for about two-and-a-half or three hours a night, but that only happens about two or three times a week, since we're always on the road. It's hard to stay on par and keep moving forward."

Columnist: Women's team on brink of deep postseason run

Matt Castro | COLLEGIAN

Sophomore forward Ashley Sweat drives to the hoop against Missouri Saturday in Columbia, Mo. Sweat has been averaging 10.7 points per game and 28 minutes of play.

Senior guard Kimberly Dietz looks to shoot against Missouri Saturday. Dietz is the Wildcats' leading scorer, averaging 15 points per game and is shooting 76 percent from the foul line.

Matt Castro
COLLEGIAN

The homestretch of the conference season has fallen upon us, and the K-State basketball team has itself positioned to capture its first out-right Big 12 regular season championship.

With a dominant inside presence accompanied by a solid and experienced backcourt, this team has the ability and drive to make a deep run into the NCAA tournament. The above description might immediately have some of you thinking of the K-State men's basketball team, and you would not be wrong in thinking so. But the team I'm referring to is actually not the men's, but their counterparts from Bramlage Coliseum, the women's basketball team. Quietly, consistently and somewhat surprisingly, the women's team have been winning and climbing in the national polls.

After a decent start to the 2007-08 basketball season, the K-State women suddenly found themselves unable to achieve any success on the road. By suffering road losses to Wyoming, Wisconsin-Green Bay and Creighton, they were quickly slipping into a deep hole and struggling to get out. The always-difficult Big 12 regular season schedule was also creeping up on them, but something changed.

Whether it was an increase in defensive pressure, shooting percentage or subtle coaching adjustments, a Christmas wish was answered for the women's team during the holiday break. The K-State women became winners and conference-title contenders in the blink of an eye. Games and situations the Wildcats were initially on the losing end of (Wyoming and Creighton come to mind) were quickly resolved and reversed as the team beat Texas A&M, Texas, Oklahoma State and Nebraska — all on the road.

Some might call it a stretch of luck, but it has been anything but that. Since Christmas, the Wildcats have won 13 of 14 games and currently sit in first place in the conference standings with a 10-1 record. Baylor, who has a tie-breaking win over the Wildcats, is in second place and also has one more tally in the loss column.

The next-closest contender the Wildcats have to worry about is Oklahoma, who will travel to Manhattan tonight. With a win over the Sooners (18-5, 8-3 Big 12 Conference) and a quick look at future conference games, I have to think that the Wildcats can put the wraps on the conference regular-season title this week. Truly an amazing accomplishment for the initial expectations from this team.

So, how have the Wildcats done it? How have they achieved the status of front-runners for the Big 12 title? Statistically speaking, it is easy to see. The Wildcats are first in points-allowed per game, giving up 56.6 per contest; first in three-point defensive percentage, limiting the opposition to just 21.9 percent per outing and fifth in offensive points per game, averaging 65.5 points a night.

Veering away from the statistics, the Wildcats have displayed poise, experience and leadership in late-game situations. Shalee Lehning, Kimberly Dietz and Marlies Gipson have carried the team night in and night out with great plays on almost every possession. Lehning might not be the most polished point guard K-State has ever seen, but she is by far the best floor general the Wildcats have had in years. Coach Deb Patterson might have finally discovered the missing link to what prevented greatness in the early part of this decade, a dependable and big game situation point-guard.

Ashley Sweat, Kari Kincaid and the overall depth of the bench are often forgotten when it comes to reasons for K-State's success. No matter what the situation, Patterson has been able to go to her bench and get solid production and big-time minutes. If these keep up, the limits of this team seem endless.

So how far is this team going to go? What titles and accolades might this team attain? Those questions are yet to be answered, but one thing I know for sure is this team is deserving of credit and an increase in attention. Quietly and steadily it is starting to grow, just like the Wildcats' numbers in the win column.

Many young Big 12 coaches suffer through growing pains of 1st few seasons

We're more than halfway through the Big 12 Conference season, can you believe it? With only six games left on the schedule, each team has the monumental task of not embarrassing themselves in front of the rest of the conference and the NCAA Selection Committee as the final buzzers sound.

WENDY HAUN

More often than not, the coaches can be put in a harsh spotlight for any major losses down the stretch. New coaches Jeff Bzdelik, Frank Martin, Mark Turgeon and Pat Knight have had their work cut out for them this year, dealing with the veterans but for the most part, they have held their own.

How does each coach stack up? Their victories – and defeats – gives us a glimpse into how they should fare as coaches in the future.

SCOTT DREW, BAYLOR GRADE: A

Drew took a team that finished in Big 12 play last year at 4-12 and has turned them into legitimate contenders this year. They have mounted a 5-5 conference record, their best-ever Big 12 play start. Their highlight reel includes a five-overtime victory over Texas A&M in College Station, Texas, as well as victories over South Carolina and Notre Dame. Baylor has the second-highest scoring offense in the conference, averaging 81 points per game. Junior guard Curtis Jerrells leads the offensive attack for the Bears, averaging almost 15 points per game.

Drew has done an excellent job with this team. For most of the players on his team, the closest they will get to an NBA court is the bleachers, but he has taken them and turned them into a team vying for post-season play. Baylor should take extra care to hold on to Drew.

DREW

JEFF BZDELIK, COLORADO GRADE: C

Colorado was the basement of the Big 12 last season. They only were able to eke out wins against Iowa State, Oklahoma State and Nebraska. Their fortunes haven't improved much this season as they are once again sitting at the bottom of the Big 12 standings, posting a 2-8 record so far. Their lone Big 12 wins have come against Nebraska and Oklahoma, with close contests against Texas, Missouri and

BZDELIK

Oklahoma State.

Bzdelik, in his first year as coach at Colorado, has seen better times. He posted a 50-16 record in two years as the coach at Air Force, but there he was working with better talent in a lower-caliber conference. It will take more than just a season to measure what impact Bzdelik could have at the Big 12-level but he has shown he is capable. It may take a few years for his recruiting skills to show before he can produce.

GREG MCDERMOTT, IOWA STATE GRADE: C

McDermott took a team that finished below .500 last season and has them sitting just above that mark with a 14-12 overall record. Iowa State has possibly their most difficult road ahead, with games at Texas Tech and against Kansas and K-State at home.

The Cyclones, which are wedged in Big Ten country, have played several of that conference's teams, such as Minnesota, Iowa, Purdue and North Dakota. They received a banner win against Purdue, which sits atop the Big Ten standings, Dec. 22 in an 83-80 win.

However, their fortunes ended in Big 12 play. Their only victories have been against Missouri, Oklahoma State and Colorado. In all of their conference losses, the Cyclones didn't even come close to winning. McDermott is a coach with 13 years of experience under his belt, as well as an overall winning record. Some may say this Iowa State team could be lacking in talent, but sometimes, coaching can overcome a lack of talent. McDermott should be a veteran-enough coach to overcome these woes.

BILL SELF, KANSAS GRADE: B

Self is no Roy Williams. Williams, the greatest coach to come along at Kansas since Phog Allen himself, posted a winning record of 418-101, led KU to the NCAA tournament 14 seasons and to the Final Four four times. Williams has since won a championship at North Carolina. Bill Self has an impressive KU record – 105-29 through his first four seasons – but his teams haven't made it past the Elite Eight yet. Self also did something Williams never did: He lost to K-State. Twice.

Self has taken a KU team that is unparalleled in talent and has failed to meet expectations again and again. After losing two years in a row to first-round nobodies, he failed again to make the Final Four last year. It's often the fact that he's being out-coached in his games rather than a lack of talent. Self's been a great recruiter – the KU prominence helps with that – but putting the players in the right rotations and the right schemes helps.

MCDERMOTT

FRANK MARTIN, K-STATE GRADE: A

Martin took a team in obvious turmoil – it had missed the NCAA Tournament by the skin of its teeth and its coach bolted and ran after one season here – and has made it a true contender for the regular-season crown. With only two losses (one a brutal three-point loss to Missouri and the other a nine-point loss to Texas Tech, both on the road), K-State is off to their best conference start since the 1987-88 season, when they finished the Big Eight season 11-3 under coach Lon Kruger.

Martin was criticized earlier in the year for his freshman mistakes, which are all but gone now. We have seen what happens when Martin leads this recruiting class and coaches a superb game (see the 84-75 victory over No. 2 KU Jan. 30) and what happens when things go terribly wrong (see Texas Tech and Notre Dame). Although most will be quick to say K-State is only succeeding because of Beasley, I say Beasley isn't doing it all himself. Martin is figuring out who to put around the superstar freshman forward and is one of the reasons K-State sits tied for second in the league.

MIKE ANDERSON, MISSOURI GRADE: B

Anderson has done what he can this year with Missouri, who finished in the middle of the pack last year. After mid-season disaster struck (his leading scorer, Stephon Hannah, broke his jaw, which ended his season. Four other members of his team were suspended for fighting and Hannah was dismissed from the team after being arrested for assault), I'm sure Anderson is just waiting for the end of the season so a new one can begin.

Make no mistake about it – at full strength, the Tigers beat Texas, Maryland, Michigan State and Purdue – Anderson can coach. He's doing a fairly decent job of rebuilding Missouri to the top of the Big 12 standings. It just may take a few more years to cycle in more talent before Anderson can coach them to the NCAA Tournament.

MARTIN

DOC SADLER, NEBRASKA GRADE: C

Nebraska is another team who might fall short on expectations. After finishing last season at 17-14 with a 6-10 Big 12 record, Sadler has coached Nebraska to three victories thus far. They beat Oregon – something K-State failed to do – but they have since dropped all their conference games except for Missouri, Iowa State and Texas Tech. They had the unfortunate circumstance of having KU as their first conference game.

Although they have come close several times, they haven't quite made it over the hump. With K-State, Texas A&M, Oklahoma and Texas still looming on the schedule, it might be next year before Sadler gets this Cornhuskers team over the .500 mark. With only one senior on the team – center Aleks Maric – Sadler will have more chances to work with this team down the road. A decent sophomore and freshman class might be valuable for Nebraska.

JEFF CAPEL, OKLAHOMA GRADE: B

Oklahoma faced the task of replacing Kelvin Sampson – something they are probably very happy about right now, on the eve of his impending NCAA violations hearings – and did a good job with Capel. Oklahoma finished 6-10 in Capel's first season and has been climbing slowly during this season.

They're sitting even in conference standings at 5-5, with wins over Baylor, in-state rival Oklahoma State and Texas Tech. However, they have dropped winnable games to K-State (a two-point loss in their conference opener), Texas A&M and Texas. Easily their worst loss was a 72-58 smackdown at Colorado.

It's really on-again, off-again with the Sooners. Capel's team is poised for greatness with freshman forward Blake Griffin taking up the spotlight. The only senior on the team is center Longar Longar, a player who has just started to show his versatility but is fresh off an injury.

However, Capel's recruiting tactics are paying off and in a few years, I can see the Sooners vying for the Big 12 crown under Capel.

After all, Capel has a basketball legacy – his father coached, his brother played at North Carolina and he was nominated for an ESPY for College Basketball Player of the Year as a player on the 1997 Duke team.

SADLER

SEAN SUTTON, OKLAHOMA STATE GRADE: D

When you take over after the man the basketball court is named after, there's going to be a lot of pressure. There's even more if you're Eddie Sutton's son. Sean, who mounted a 6-10 conference record in his first season, looks to be on the mark to fall even worse this season. Oklahoma State has a 4-7 record, with their only wins coming against Baylor, Texas A&M, Colorado and Texas Tech. Their pre-season was somewhat soft – their only major win came the third game of the year against LSU. They suffered damaging losses against Marquette, Illinois, Pittsburgh and Oral Roberts.

With rival Oklahoma still looming on the schedule, as well as a visit to Austin to see Texas, not to mention a home game against Kansas, Sutton will earn his paycheck the next four weeks. Sean doesn't quite have the coaching abilities of his father – Eddie is one of five coaches who reached 800 wins – or of his brother – Scott is the coach at Oral Roberts and took the Golden Eagles to the NCAA Tournament the past two years – so he'll have his work cut out for him.

RICK BARNES, TEXAS GRADE: A

Barnes has his team prepped for another NCAA Tournament. He's posted an impressive win-loss ratio (216-86 in nine seasons at Texas) and his Longhorns only have posted four losses this season (to Michigan State, Wisconsin, Missouri and Texas A&M). Texas definitely brought their A-game on Feb. 11 when they topped KU in a Big Monday showdown to hand the Jayhawks their second loss (and any team that beats KU is a good team).

Texas made it to the finals of the Big 12 Tournament last year (they lost by four to KU) and then, to the second round of the NCAA Tournament (where they fell by 19 to USC). Barnes has demonstrated a superb coaching ability while at Texas and also has brought in recruits to attract attention to the Longhorns (Kevin Durant, anybody?) While Durant is one of the most prominent Texas players as of late, they also have excellent players in D.J. Augustin, who is in the running for several player of the year awards and A.J. Abrams. Barnes has helped bring the Big 12 Showcase away from KU mostly because of Barnes' ability to win at key times.

While K-State flourishes, Bob Huggins falters

Bob Huggins during his coaching days at K-State. Huggins decided to go coach at his alma mater, West Virginia, after the 2006-07 season. West Virginia is 15-6 overall and 4-4 in Big East Conference play.

Take a look back to Dec. 5, 2007.

Under the leadership of former K-State coach Bob Huggins, the West Virginia Mountaineers had just capped off an 88-59 thumping of Auburn and were off to a 6-1 start. Their only loss was a 74-72 decision against then-No. 7 Tennessee. They would go on to win their next four contests, and they would crack the Associated Press Top 25 poll Dec. 10 with a No. 23 ranking. It appeared that Huggins had his new squad on track for a great season.

Just one day before, K-State, under the direction of new head coach Frank Martin, fell to Notre Dame, 68-59, at Madison Square Garden. It was the Wildcats' second consecutive loss and their third in five games. The Wildcats would respond with four consecutive wins, but would then suffer a 103-77 drubbing against Xavier in Cincinnati, Ohio. This would leave K-State with only one win against an NCAA Tournament-caliber team, an 82-75 victory over California, and a disappointing 2-3 record outside of Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats were battling growing pains and they were still searching for their identity.

Fast-forward to Jan. 30. K-State, then-No. 22 in the nation, had just knocked off then-No. 2 and previously undefeated Kansas. It was the Wildcats' second victory over a Top-10 team in the month of January, including a 75-54 victory over then-No. 9 Texas A&M on Jan. 19. With wins at Oklahoma and Colorado, it appeared K-State had also taken care of its road woes.

The Wildcats sat alone atop the Big 12 standings with a 5-0 conference record. After a 100-63 win over Missouri last weekend, K-State, now ranked No. 24, is 8-2 in the Big 12 and just a half a game out of the conference lead.

A few hours before fans flooded onto the Bramlage Coliseum floor, West Virginia suffered a 62-39 setback against Cincinnati in Morgantown, W.Va. It was their fifth loss in their last ten games and their second consecutive Big East Conference loss.

They had dropped to 4-4 in conference play and 15-6 overall.

After such a promising start to the season, the Mountaineers have been struck by inconsistency. They also lack the ability to win close games (1-5 in games decided by 10 points or less) and games against quality opponents (1-3 against ranked teams). They are 7-5 in the Big East and 18-7 overall.

While both teams will most likely be heading to the NCAA Tournament in March, the Wildcats appear to be more poised to make a deep run. They have shown that they can hang with any team in the country and their athleticism gives them a big advantage over many opponents.

West Virginia is a very talented team, but when tournament time arrives, their lack of consistency and the ability to win close games will probably be their downfall. After last season, Huggins left K-State for what he thought would be a better team in West Virginia. Now it appears the Wildcats might get the last laugh.

HAUN | Texas' Barnes, K-State's Martin doing best Big 12 coaching jobs

MARK TURGEON, TEXAS A&M GRADE: C

Texas A&M finished second in the Big 12 standings last year. What they have done this year is struggled to stay above .500 in conference play. With losses against Texas Tech, K-State, Baylor, Oklahoma State and Texas, the Aggies went from one of the league favorites, to struggling to hang on to a NCAA Tournament berth.

Turgeon is in his first year as the Aggies head coach. He came to A&M after bolting from Wichita State, where he took the Shockers to the Sweet Sixteen in 2005-06. After a year when they fell to sixth in the Missouri Valley Conference, Turgeon left the Shockers to go to Texas A&M in place of Billy Gillespie, who left for Kentucky last year.

Turgeon still has a chance this season to redeem himself — starting first with a win Feb. 27 over in-state rival Texas Tech — but they will also have to get past a three-game stretch of Texas, Baylor and KU.

Turgeon hasn't exactly shown his best coaching this season, finding out the Big 12 is slightly more competitive than the MVC. Eventually, Turgeon will find the best mix of players, but it might take a few painful years to get it right.

PAT KNIGHT, TEXAS TECH GRADE: C

The only saving grace of Knight's grade was his victory over

K-State. Knight took a reeling Tech team who had lost to Nebraska, Baylor, Oklahoma and Oklahoma State, and managed to pull out the upset over the Wildcats in the second game of his head-coaching career. After his father Bob decided to retire mid-season, Pat was suddenly handed the reins of a Tech team that is lacking in talent and depth.

With K-State still being Pat's only head coaching victory, there are some opportunities in the near future, starting with Colorado tonight. There's also a big opportunity Saturday against Iowa State. The rest of the schedule doesn't look promising, but with Texas A&M, Texas, KU and Baylor remaining, we'll see exactly how much of a fluke the K-State game was.

NAACP speaker cancelled for snow

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Because of weather predictions of snow, Julian Bond, chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has cancelled his speech for this evening.

Bond was scheduled to give the keynote lecture for K-State's Black History Month Celebration at 7 p.m. in the K-State Alumni Center Ballroom.

Bryon Williams, president of the K-State Black Student Union, said Bond and his wife did not feel comfortable flying this morning from Washington, D.C., with such high chances of bad weather.

According to the National Weather Service forecast for today, "A mix of snow, sleet and freezing rain will extend from southeast Kansas into the lower Ohio Valley."

Williams said Bond gave the BSU an option to reschedule.

"We will try our best to reschedule, but there are lots of logistic issues involved," Williams said.

The organization will try to reschedule Bond's speech later in March, he said. Williams said the BSU "sincerely regrets and apologizes for any inconveniences."

Drugged

Authorities say use of date-rape drugs on the rise

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Kate was 18 and a freshman at K-State, she was drugged and raped in her hometown by a man she considered a friend. Now, more than a year and a half later, she is still struggling emotionally from the incident and her rapist has not been taken to justice.

Kate is not alone in her circumstance. Captain Tim Hegarty of the Riley County Police Department said in Riley County in 2007 there were 44 rapes or attempted rapes, but this number only represents those who reported the crime.

"It is fairly understood in the law community that rape is an under-reported crime," Hegarty said.

Mary Todd, director of the K-State Women's Center, said nationally 50-60 percent of rapes of college women occur while the women are intoxicated. She also said nationwide there has been an increase of drug-related rapes.

"There is definitely an increase in the number of women that are surprised by the physical reaction to one or two cocktails and who wake up with bad after-effects," Todd said.

From October to December there were 13 reported rapes, and Hegarty said in every case the suspect knew the victim, which he said is typical.

He said it is possible drugs were involved in those cases, however it is difficult to prove because drugs generally leave the body within 24 hours.

Reports of date-rape drug use have increased over the past several years across the country and at K-State.

Ebony Theatre continues after decades of productions

Students perform in a rehearsal for "Mud River," presented by Ebony Theatre. The production will show tonight through Saturday at 7:30 p.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre.

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since 1976, Ebony Theatre has been the only student-run, African-American theater company in the Midwest.

The 32-year-old organization is presenting its newest production "Mud, River, Stone" by Lynn Nottage tonight through Saturday.

Tyler Woods, director and president of Ebony Theatre, said "Mud, River, Stone" is about an African-American power couple who decide to take a trip to Africa. The trip doesn't go as planned, but they experience many different situations and receive a culture shock to the realities of Africa. He said this play addresses different issues of identity and common stereotypes of Africa. The production will begin at 7:30 p.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre.

Woods said the play is comprised of student actors from different backgrounds and varying capabilities that bring diversity to the play.

Woods, a graduate student in speech communication, theater and dance, has been involved with Ebony Theatre since 2001. After graduating, Woods recently returned to Ebony Theatre in 2007 when he received the opportunity to take a graduate position after the previous president graduated from K-State.

"It seems like this show was a different texture than what we have worked with in previous years," he said. "The last play was contemporary but didn't necessarily go to this corner of the world."

But "Mud, River, Stone" is just one of numerous productions that have been presented by Ebony Theatre, and the play that formed Ebony Theatre was the student-written piece titled "Nobody Like Me."

Former Ebony Theatre adviser Anne Butler said the success of the show created an awareness for a need of a theater group.

SGA presidential candidates answer pertinent questions

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The five candidates for student body president answered questions concerning campus issues like environmental sustainability and safety at a debate at noon on Wednesday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

The candidates first had an opportunity to describe their platforms and slogans.

Jonathan "Ninjitsu" Culver was the first to introduce himself with his platform "eliminate all pirates."

Culver, freshman in civil engineering, said he also wants to eliminate all drunkenness.

"All pirates are dirty, nasty, grumpy ugly men — and sometimes women," he said.

Bryan Cox next came forward with a statement about potential change and solutions for K-State.

"Our platform is all about thinking about the issues and finding ways to change things to make them better for Kansas State students," Cox, junior in political science, said.

Student Body Vice President Lydia Peele, senior in mathematics education, was next.

"We're running on the campaign for 'more,'" Peele said. "We want to give [students] more than [they] are already getting from K-State."

Andrew Glazier, senior in social sciences, used his introduction time to invite the audience to look up him and his running mate on the Internet at www.glazier-miller.com.

Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr said he had many "planks" to share in his brief introduction.

"Foremost, there is an underground movement of ninja infestations to be addressed," he said. "We believe in doing, not just thinking, and bringing fun to these here politics."

The format of the debate was one question at a time, which each candidate was allotted two minutes to answer. After the planned questions, the candidates answered audience members' questions.

Does K-State need to expand the shuttle system, and should it continue after the parking garage is completed?

-Culver said the expansion of the shuttle would be an asset. He also said his ninjas would carry students on their backs anywhere they want to go. He promised that students would get anywhere they need with warmth and safety.

-Glazier said based on his platform, the shuttle system should be utilized better. On its routes back and forth from the Union to Peters Recreational Complex, it passes many buildings, and Glazier suggested the shuttle should stop at these locations. He said the continuation of the shuttle service beyond the garage's completion is a bridge that should be crossed when they get there.

-Cox said when people saw the number of riders on the shuttles they were amazed. Part of his platform is environmental sustainability. He said having a shuttle system cuts down on greenhouse gases. He also said no matter how many parking spots students get in the new garage, it's not going to eliminate the scarcity of parking spots on K-State's campus, and so the shuttle service would still be valuable.

-Peele said she is a little bit more wary about expanding the service, because in 2010, Manhattan will have fresh census results that might mean federal funding for public transportation. Peele explained that other cities provide that kind of service to residents, and it would be feasible here.

-Schurr said he "sees eye-to-eye" with Glazier. He said he likes the idea of a shuttle service becoming part of K-State, but he would prefer that the shuttles have sales. Schurr said he thinks it's sad, though, that K-State students are made to ride a short bus.

German puts out cigarette with fire extinguisher

BERLIN (Reuters) — A virulent anti-smoker in Germany was so angry when his girlfriend lit up that he emptied a fire extinguisher to put out the cigarette, caking her and their apartment in powder. "My colleagues said it looked like a bomb had gone off in there," said a spokesman for police in the western city of Bielefeld. "He managed to put the cigarette out though."

After the woman ignored his request not to smoke, the 42-year-old sprayed the contents of the extinguisher all around the flat shouting abuse, police said.

"He said he wasn't bothered by the damage it caused," the spokesman said. "And that he's through with his girlfriend."

California man says, 'Give me your tacos'

FONTANA, Calif. — A hunger for carnitas nearly led to some carnage after a Fontana man was robbed of a bag of tacos at gunpoint. Police Sergeant Jeff Decker said the 35-year-old victim had just bought about $20 in tacos from a street-corner stand Sunday night and was bicycling home when the suspect confronted him and said, "Give me your tacos."

Decker said the suspect grabbed the bag of food, punched the victim in the face and began to flee. When the victim de-

Lieutenant allegedly uses Taser on cow, distributes videotape of incident to co-workers

ROGERS, Ark. — Police are conducting an internal investigation into an allegation that a lieutenant used his stun gun to shock a cow and shared a videotape of the incident with other department employees.

Police Chief Steve Helms said Tuesday the inquiry began after he received a complaint from the group People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals. A letter dated Feb. 11 from PETA representative Stephanie Bell complained that Lt. David Mitchell filmed himself using the electronic stun device on the cow.

Electronic stun guns are used as less-lethal weapons to subdue people who pose a threat to officers.

Bell said in the letter that Mitchell distributed the video as a joke among friends and co-workers, and she notes that animal cruelty is a misdemeanor crime in Arkansas.

Helms didn't immediately return a call for comment on Wednesday. City Attorney Ben Lipscomb said Tuesday that the alleged incident happened 2 1/2 years ago, which would be beyond the statute of limitations for misdemeanors. Lipscomb said there would be no point in pursuing a criminal investigation.

Helms said a captain in the department will conduct the investigation and Mitchell will remain on regular duty.

Student Senate to vote on tabled Union minimum wage bill

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate will vote for the second time on a bill that could compensate for proposed K-State Student Union minimum wage increases in the union.

The bill, if passed, will increase the K-State Student Union Operations Budget by $10,000 to compensate for the increase in on-campus minimum wage.

Faculty senate representatives Bill Muir and Tim Weninger spoke out against the bill last Thursday evening.

The bill would have raised all Union employees' wages proportionally, not just those making less than the new minimum wage.

Weninger, graduate student in computer science, said the proportional raises would not correspond with the bill's implementation in other areas of campus.

The bill was sent back to the committee and is on tonight's agenda under "final action."

Additional College Council funding from a reserve fund is also on the agenda.

The council might run out of money this year from all the allocations to College Council organizations.

Student Senate also will vote on the addition of a senator this evening. If the resolution passes, Krista Leben, senior in political science, will fill a senate vacancy for the College of Arts and Sciences.

Four allocations and a resolution in support of Northern Illinois University administration, alumni, faculty and students are in the new legislation.

Philosophy entrance limited, not impossible

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's philosophy department is implementing a new waiting list policy next year that should give underclassmen the chance to take philosophy classes to fulfill requirements.

James Hamilton, professor in philosophy, said the policy will admit people into classes electronically on a "first come, first served" basis. He said this might help freshmen and sophomores who might be able to take an upperclassman's spot if they drop out.

Marcelo Sabates, head of the philosophy department, said every student in the College of Arts and Sciences must take a philosophy course, and because the classes are writing intensive, they must be small. "Six or seven years ago our waiting lists were huge," Sabates said.

"Today, the waiting lists are big but not huge."

Sabates said it is difficult for freshmen and sophomores to enroll in philosophy classes because they fill quickly, but juniors and seniors should not have trouble fulfilling their class requirements.

"We never leave graduating seniors without seats, and we very, very rarely leave seniors without seats," he said. "For a department of our size and our needs, we have a reasonable amount of professors."

The department is offering more classes this year to accommodate more juniors, Sabates said. And they are offering 15 sections of introductory classes per semester. He said some students think they must take Philosophy 100 to fulfill their arts and sciences requirement, but in reality, any philosophy course can count.

Sabates said the department has 11 professors and no graduate students teaching.

"We could use more professors, but I wouldn't describe the situation as a shortage," Sabates said.

Hamilton said the philosophy department accommodate seniors with seats first. He said they had a section designated just for freshmen, but juniors and seniors "crashed" it. Next year, the online enrollment system will bar juniors and seniors from taking this section.

Jessica Bigger, adviser for pre-journalism and mass communications, said underclassmen sometimes get frustrated when they cannot get into philosophy courses.

"We usually talk about [taking philosophy] their freshman or sophomore year and they try to get into it," Bigger said.

But any frustration caused, Bigger said, is "more disappointment because they're excited to [take the class]."

Mark Nelson, senior in social sciences with a minor in philosophy, said talking to the professor is the key to getting into a philosophy class.

"Get into contact with the professor as soon as the class schedule comes out," Nelson said. "Most of the time they don't mind."

Hamilton said anywhere from five to 20 students could be on a waiting list for a philosophy class during the semester, but he said the department hopes the new waiting list system will alleviate the number of people who must wait.

"We don't know how exactly this will work out with this new system," Hamilton said. "We hope to ease the pressure and allow some underclassmen to get into classes."

THEATRE | 18-year adviser sustained company

color who enjoy the performing aspects of theater, those students decided to create a group called Ebony Theatre," she said.

Butler, Ebony Theatre adviser from 1978-96, said she was originally approached by a former fellow faculty member who was unable to continue advising the group because of her newly accepted position. She said her fellow staff member specifically came with several folders and documents and said, "These are for Ebony Theatre. Keep the theater going." And that's what Butler did for the next 18 years.

Butler reminisced about some of the different challenges like rehearsal space, commitment and discipline of the actors, but she stayed with Ebony Theatre almost 20 years because she was able to see students grow and create bonds with one another, she said.

"It fit my soul and nurtured my spirit to see these young students become connected to African American literary figures," she said. "If there was an opening, I would gladly come back and become adviser again."

Butler's legacy as adviser remains at the Ebony Theatre at K-State. During her term as adviser, she was able to work with and encourage non-theater majors to participate in the company, and this continues today.

Monica Kennedy, sophomore in psychology, said she heard about the auditions for the play through her theater course.

"I was in the theater class, and [Woods] came to speak to my class," she said. "So I thought I should just try it."

Kennedy went to the play without as much experience as others but said she was welcomed by everyone and received a role as a part of the African Chorus.

"It was a bit intimidating because a lot of them were theater majors and had been in college theater productions, but [Woods] definitely made everyone feel inclusive and part of the group," she said.

Kennedy encouraged her fellow students to see the performance, support Ebony Theatre and gain knowledge of the often misunderstood continent of Africa.

"It does really give you an insight to what African really is," she said. "It's realistic in a sense, and sometimes you don't always get that in plays."

Religious high school ignores Title IX rights

Though St. Mary's Academy would be the unanimous victor in the contest of fanaticism in any other state, the school traditionally has been undercut by Topeka's more rabid and vocal cult at the Westboro Baptist Church.

But within the context of a high school basketball game, the little schismatic Catholic school might finally have managed to close the gap.

It's important for me to note that St. Mary's is a satellite of the Society of St. Pius X, a heretical sect which emerged in 1970 as a self-described fundamentalist reaction to the proceedings of Vatican II, and it has been at odds with the Holy See since its leader was excommunicated in 1988. In short, the group's misbehavior is unsanctioned by even the ultraconservative Vatican.

About 10 minutes before tip-off in a home game against Word of Life, a St. Mary's school official had to inform the assigned referee duo — Darin Putthoff and Michelle Campbell — of an outlandish and unexpected stipulation to the contest: Campbell would need to be replaced because of St. Mary's policy prohibiting women from taking positions of authority over men.

Both referees, of course, immediately balked at this absurd request and left, bringing with them in sympathy the other referees who could have served as potential replacements. As a final indignity, one of the school's own administrators ultimately was forced to officiate the game, which they lost. (A statement to which the humorist in me wishes to add, "in every way.")

St. Mary's Academy is not a member school in the Kansas State High School Activities Association (KSHSAA). However, it is on its list of approved schools, a dubious distinction which seems to give the school both the benefit of autonomy and an air of approval from the state. For the reasonable person, the question is not whether this behavior should be condemned, but rather, "Why are we even pretending to take these zealots seriously?"

First, the constitutional argument of discrimination masquerading as an issue of religious tolerance: The moment an organization — religious or otherwise — joins a state-funded league, accepts state monies or wishes to benefit from the association in any capacity, it agrees to abide by the state's conventions of nondiscrimination. In this specific situation, this entails observing Title IX, which insists rather straightforwardly that no one will face discrimination under any educational program with federal assistance.

In other words, if an organization wishes to engage in blatant discriminatory behavior, it must do so without the benefit of the state's money or its support. St. Mary's is no exception, and any other interpretation of the law is an affront to the other associated schools, those without openly misogynistic rules on their books.

And as for the moral case: The silliness of this pathetic little snub is self-evident, but the implications might not be. We must — not only as taxpayers but as proponents of liberal democracy — condemn this appalling misconduct, and we must do so without compunction. This is a more necessary imperative than the apologists might wish for you to believe; the systematic subjugation of women usually foreshadows much more sinister bigotry, and as a corollary, the emancipation of women usually serves as a leading indicator of a society's successful development.

It must be said: Those at St. Mary's Academy have the right to practice their religion as they wish, but we shouldn't sanction it with either our dollars or our consciences. KSHSAA's immediate and wholesale disassociation from these extremists is a necessary but insufficient condition for maintaining decency; we must continue to condemn it after the procedural judgments have come to pass.

If the KSHSAA decides upon any other consequence, they will have done themselves, every member school and the rest of Kansas a grave disservice.

Movie appealing because teen comfortable with own identity

I bet many of you have seen the movie "Juno." It seems to be all the talk right now.

The movie was pretty good, but until now I have had trouble seeing why it has become such a huge success. A low budget, home-grown movie like "Juno" being nominated for best film at the Oscars is insane. So I started thinking. What makes "Juno" so amazing? Why have my friends said it is, hands down, the best movie of 2007? I couldn't figure it out until yesterday, when it hit me — Juno is herself.

While most 16-year-old girls are trying to convince their parents to buy them a car and sweaters from the mall, Juno talks on hamburger phones and drives a Previa minivan ("the egg" was proudly my first fly set of wheels as well).

Talking on a hamburger phone was definitely not cool before Juno did it, but according to trendwatcher.com, sales are up 759 percent on eBay.com.

The soundtrack to the movie, with song lyrics like, "I've got my Scrabble game, food on my plate, good friends and family" is a far cry from the money, girls and cars of Top-40 music. However, it is the first soundtrack to reach the No. 1 spot since "Titanic" did it 11 years ago. (Who can forget Celine Dion?)

The reason people across America have fallen in love with "Juno" is because Juno knows who she is and she doesn't pretend otherwise. A quote that I found from Jason Reitman, the director of the film, while flipping through a magazine confirmed my brilliant conclusion. He said he rejected the original idea in the script of Juno loving glam rock, because glam rock is meant to be inauthentic.

"Juno is the most authentic character in the film," Reitman said in the article.

Most people's inability to appreciate who they are goes hand-in-hand with their obsession with celebrities. Because many of us are not content with who we are and the places we are in, we look to people who seem to live larger than life, who have all that money can buy.

Author Donald Miller addresses this problem in his influential book, "Blue Like Jazz."

"I think ... that there is this undercurrent in society that says some people are cool and some people aren't," he wrote. "And it is very, very important that we are cool. So when we find somebody who is cool and on television or on the radio, we associate ourselves with this person to feel valid ourselves."

People who don't try to act like other people are attractive. There is a confidence and assurance around them that people notice and want to be around.

What is the age-old advice given when a friend asks how to act on the first date? Just be yourself. Why do we only use that adage for special occasions but not in everyday life?

Miller went on to say in his book that "everybody wants to be fancy and new. Nobody wants to be themselves. If there was a guy who just liked being himself and didn't want to be anybody else, that guy would be the most different guy in the world and everyone would want to be him."

Our generation is growing tired of mass-produced, beauty-pageant smiles. We want people to just be themselves. So when you feel different, think of Juno, and don't be afraid to keep talking on your hamburger phone.

I wonder — was that poem really about some guy's penis?

Hey, soprano with the purple coat: Come say hi to me after class.

Who needs to wear shorts that bad that they wear long johns underneath them?

You can't spell crap without rap.

Not right now you don't.

I just got a zero on an assignment I spent three hours on for not putting my name on it. Are you serious?

To the people that have lost their kitten: If I find it, it's dead.

I wish my job could be making quotes for the Fourum.

Hi, Fourum. We're stuck on a Moore Hall elevator. Is it surprising? I think not.

I remember when things were shoes, not under-bitches.

I'm no longer an elevator virgin. I finally got stuck.

Everybody really knows the Titanic sank because they ran out of root beer.

Funny thing about driving your car off a cliff: You're still hitting the brakes.

To the really hot girl I sat next to at Telefund on Tuesday night: We should date. I mean, you're hot and I'm — uh, I've got this bag I can put over my head.

Oh, I meant Monday night.

I'm eating a turkey sandwich.

Who's the idiot that designed Third Street and Bluemont? Traffic is ridiculous there.

To the guy juggling on sixth floor of Goodnow: I can see you. Want to go get coffee?

Who knows which is which and who's who?

Hey, Alex: Pumpkins, schmumpkins. Wait 'til STP gets back together this year.

I know sorority girls wear Uggs boots, but what are they?

Will you rub lotion on my back later?

Why are there girls wearing swimsuits playing racquetball?

To the people who live above me: Yes, your toilet works, so stop flushing it.

Well, it's good to know the ball fits in there.

To the girl that's sick of waiting on me to back in at the UC: Use the other entrance.

You shouldn't have to beg people to be your running mate.

To the girl who lives on seventh floor Ford: Stop running up and down the stairs. Take the elevator already.

To the girl on the ninth floor: You are a bad singer.

Is it weird that we're in someone's dorm room and they're not here?

To the short cheerleader: Your bow's best.

I burnt my tongue.

And I burnt it bad.

There are some stupid people smoking cigarettes outside of Moore right now. Seriously.

To the girl who wears cheetah-print slippers to the Derby every single day: Buy some shoes.

How funky is your monkey?

All I have to say is, thank God I'm not the only one who bombed the human body test. Wow is right.

When Mary calls the Fourum, she sounds like she's drunk every time.

I will kill the people who pick out the strawberries in Special K.

Alcohol influence never OK when making intercourse decisions

Every two minutes someone is sexually assaulted in the United States, according to RAINN.org. One in every six American women and one in 33 men will be sexually assaulted.

Most sexual assaults involve alcohol, and this creates some problems. People try to place the blame away from themselves by giving excuses like "She was coming on to me," or "He made the first move."

The circumstance does not matter; excuses are never acceptable for taking advantage of someone sexually, whether it is rape or simply coming on to a partner inappropriately.

It is especially not OK when alcohol is involved. People do not think as coherently as they do normally when they are intoxicated. She might not realize she is flirting as much as she is, and he might be thinking one look is an invitation to sleep together, but none of this makes any kind of sexual act acceptable.

The only time anything sexual on any level should ever happen is when both adults are aware and are consenting to the act.

Rape is much more than just a physical act of violence. It creates an emotional scar that will never go away.

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT ELECTION

SGA candidate emphasizes change

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bryan Cox, student body president candidate and junior in political science, answered a few questions about his platform and goals Wednesday afternoon.

COX

Why did you decide to run for president?

I decided to run because I had a number of people that came to me, both in the Student Senate and not in the Student Senate, and they expressed their desire for me to run for student body president. They said, "You ought to run. You should run." They wanted to know why I wasn't running.

What kind of experience do you have that would help you as student body president?

I've been in Student Senate for three years. I've been allocations chair for the past year. I know how to chair a committee. I know how to run things. I know how to get people working and get them motivated. ...

I'm very involved, very active, and I know about and am concerned and passionate about the issues.

What are the most important issues you would address as president?

Our platform is 'think about the issues, and then change them.' So it's not a call to just thought, but it's a call to action — a call to actually make an impact and make a difference in people's lives. ... So what we're doing is we're talking about three different things: Think functional, think freedom and think future. First of all, functional, getting those podcasts so that students can still get the material for their lectures, even when they can't necessarily make it to it because of an emergency or illness or what have you. Second, enhancing, revamping the freshman orientation classes to make them more interesting, more fun and better classes for freshmen. And the freedom part, just having an eye toward safety and security on campus through enhanced freshman classes, teaching campus safety as well as better visibility of the Women's Center on campus. And then finally thinking toward the future upon the environmental aspect of the fiscal aspect — getting renewable energy generation put out and working with the students that are already working toward that end and enabling and throwing the whole support of the SGA behind him.

Was your slogan "Think. Change." inspired by the Barack Obama presidential campaign?

The original thought that I had for the platform was totally different. It was "Significance, Safety and Sustainability." Piper [Hoskins] and my campaign staff came up with the idea of "Think. Change." and I thought it was great. It doesn't really have a relation to the Obama campaign.

Why write the first names with the chalking when others use last names? Is it to relate with students at a personal level?

To some extent, yeah. Our last names just didn't have the ring that we were looking for. It's nothing like just trying to be personal. Honestly they didn't have the ring, and I think that the "Bryan/Piper" looks better and it sounds better. But I do think people will identify with that more.

'Average joe' prioritizes safety

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andrew Glazier, senior in hotel and restaurant management, is in the race to become K-State's student body president. Glazier answered questions about his goals for his candidacy Wednesday afternoon.

GLAZIER

Why did you decide to run?

We decided to run because the three platforms we have are issues that my running mate and I find important to the K-State community, and they have been voiced by students and friends, and so we decided it was an appropriate time to take it on.

What do you want to see improved on campus?

Our main platform is campus safety. We want to see funding of the police department increased. We want to get more officers out there. Also, we would like to have alcohol allowed during football games because it is allowed in various other locations, luxury suites. The University of Kansas even allows it. So why can't we?

How are you advertising yourself as a candidate?

We have a Web site out www.glazier-miller.com. We have signs all over campus, chalk-ing. The chalking promotes our Web site, and signs have our e-mails. We are also encouraging our supporters to wear purple. We are also going to have a kick-off party soon. Word of mouth is another big way we are advertising, and we are asking supporters to get on Facebook.com and join the group.

If elected, what do you hope to do while in office?

I hope to accomplish our three platforms. Our slogan is "Real people, realistic results." We consider ourselves "average joe" candidates.

We think that the three platforms can be accomplished in the next year or so. We want more conservative spending and keeping control on tuition. Tuition cap is not feasible. We are looking to get an equal balance of recognition of student activities on campus.

What issue do you believe is most important on your platform?

Campus safety for sure. It is a concern for a lot of students, especially since the Virginia Tech and the Northern Illinois tragedies. Sadly this is something we have to worry about. We have to spend some serious time looking into and taking care of it. In a million years, we would have never thought it would have been the issue, but we need to look into it. We should also look into planning if this should ever happen.

What do you think sets you apart from the other candidates?

We consider ourselves the "average Joes." Over my years at K-State we have seen that some of the SGA representatives have become out of touch with the average students. That will not be happening with us. If you don't think that we are just "regular Joes," ask the people at the bars for us that will tell you otherwise. We are real guys looking to make a difference.

SOONER STRUGGLE

K-State women fall short against No. 11 Sooners; Paris twins dominate second half with 29 points

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a 10-point halftime lead, it looked like No. 15 K-State was going to hand No. 11 Oklahoma its second straight loss.

The Sooners' sister pair of junior center Courtney Paris and junior forward Ashley Paris scored 29 points in the second half to halt the Wildcats upset bid and win 68-65 Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State (18-7, 10-2 Big 12 conference) went on a 19-8 run late in the first half to establish a 38-28 lead at halftime. K-State coach Deb Patterson was pleased with the way the team defended Oklahoma and the Paris sisters through that portion of the game.

"I don't think that we are going to be perfect," Patterson said. "I do think we had some possessions we probably could have converted on, but I felt pretty good about our rebounding and our defense at that stage of the game."

The halftime lead diminished early as Oklahoma (19-5, 9-3 Big 12) went on a 7-2 run to cut the lead to five with 17:05 left in the game. The Sooners followed with an additional 15-4 run to take a 52-46 lead. Courtney Paris led the run with eight points. She finished the game with 27 points and 10 rebounds.

K-State battled back to tie the game 58-58 when sophomore forward Ashley Paris hit a three-pointer with 5:35 left in the half. Paris led the Wildcats with 25 points, a season-high. She credited the effort to the mismatch of her being guarded by a traditional post player, Ashley Paris.

"I definitely think obviously it was one of my better games on the offensive end, but I think that attributes to the fact that I feel I had a mismatch only because I feel like Ashley Paris plays inside all the time, she's not used to coming out and guarding someone who shoots or drives," Sweat said.

Oklahoma extended its lead to 66-61 with 2:33 left. Senior guard Kimberly Dietz knocked down two free-throws and scored a basket with 1:11 left to make the score 66-65.

Ashley Paris knocked down two free throws with 40 seconds left to give the Sooners a three-point lead. K-State got open three-point attempts from Dietz with 13 seconds left and Sweat with four seconds left, but could not convert on either opportunity.

The Paris sisters combined to shoot 17-of-26 from the field while the rest of the team finished 9-of-25 from the floor. K-State junior forward Marlies Gipson said the sisters were tough.

"They're both definitely great players, and they have a great sense for where each other is," Gipson said.

Patterson called the Wildcats effort a "tale of two halves," with Oklahoma having the better game when it mattered in the second half.

"We were very good in the first half and Oklahoma struggled and they were very good in the second half and we struggled," Patterson said. "I think that pretty much puts a stamp on it. It was a game in which two great basketball teams comes down to one position."

Dietz, the Wildcats leading scorer at 17 points per game in Big 12 play, struggled to find her shot going 2-for-11 from the field and finishing with nine points. Dietz, also the team's leading three-point shooter averaging 2.4 threes per game this season, made just 1-of-5 attempts in the loss.

K-State takes to the road next to play Colorado for a game at 8 p.m. Saturday. The Wildcats have four games remaining in the regular season.

Wildcats must avoid let down loss at Baylor's homecourt on Saturday

The schedule is about to get much tougher for the K-State men's basketball team, but the Wildcats have continued to prove they are worthy to be at the top of the Big 12 Conference. The only problem is, they must deal with the target on their back that comes with the status.

The season is nearing the end of the road, and thoughts of the Big 12 Conference and NCAA tournaments are on the horizon. The Wildcats can't afford to look ahead to a possible seed in the tournament for one reason: They have to avoid the trap game.

The next big hurdle K-State will have to overcome is the road trip to Baylor on Feb. 23. If you look at the schedule, you might think there's no way the Wildcats will slip up in Waco, Texas. Well, many people thought the Wildcats wouldn't lose to Texas Tech, but K-State fell into its first trap of the year. The Red Raiders, at home, came out fired up wanting to win their first game under new head coach Pat Knight, and they did.

K-State didn't play anywhere near a complete game against Texas Tech, but at the same time, Alan Voskuil was on fire, which was out of K-State's control. Every shot Voskuil took went in, and it was just the Red Raiders' night. Let's hope the Bears don't shoot out of their minds on Saturday like the Raiders did last week.

Baylor is coming off a road loss, though a thrilling one, to the Oklahoma Sooners, 92-91. The game went into overtime with Baylor missing two crucial free throws at the very end of the extra period. Baylor missed a last-second tip-in, and the Sooners escaped with the win.

Baylor doesn't have another game until its primetime matchup with the Wildcats. The game against the Bears is frightening, because they definitely will come into this game wanting to prove they can knock off a conference leader, a chance they will get when K-State visits their home floor. Also, Baylor is entering the game reeling, losing six of its last seven contests and will try to stop its four-game losing streak. That alone is enough motivation to pull off the upset, but the Bears will come into the game with the mindset that they can win.

I know every game is different and teams don't play consistently all the time, but Baylor already has beaten Texas Tech, which could give the Bears more confidence.

Beside their conference opener at Oklahoma, the Wildcats haven't really learned how to win on the road. They did beat a lowly Colorado team on the road too, but when the crucial road games came, the Wildcats couldn't deliver. The team has grown up from when they got pummeled by Xavier, but it needs to learn how to win the games it is supposed to.

A good, consistent team can't lose on the road to Missouri and then come home and win by 37. If the Wildcats want to get rid of the terrible memory of losing to Texas Tech, they can by beating Baylor.

After that — bring on the Longhorns.

K-STATE PICKED 7TH IN CONFERENCE

The K-State baseball team was given its highest-ever placing in the Big 12 Preseason Coaches' Poll as the Wildcats tied for seventh, the conference office announced Wednesday.

K-State earned 30 points, tying them with Oklahoma. It is the Wildcats best showing in the poll since the inception of the Big 12 as they had never finished higher than eighth.

Texas was voted as the league favorite to win the regular season crown for the seventh consecutive year. The Longhorns amassed 80 points as they tallied eight first place votes. Missouri finished second with 71 points and one first place vote, while Baylor finished third and grabbed the final vote to finish first.

Following Baylor, Texas A&M finished fourth ahead of Oklahoma State, Nebraska, K-State and Oklahoma. The University of Kansas and Texas Tech rounded out the voting.

K-State begins the 2008 season Friday at California and Santa Clara.

K-STATE ASSISTANT JOINS AIR FORCE

Air Force will add former K-State assistant Matt Wallerstedt to its football coaching staff, academy associate athletic director for communications Troy Garnhart confirmed Tuesday.

Wallerstedt, who spent two years with the Wildcats, will fill the vacancy created when assistant head coach Brian Knorr accepted a position at Wake Forest last week. Knorr coached the Falcons' inside linebackers.

Wallerstedt played at K-State as a linebacker from 1984 to 1987 and earned honorable mention All-America honors in 1987.

He coached linebackers in his two seasons at his alma mater and also served as the Wildcats' recruiting coordinator during the 2006 season and their special teams coordinator in 2007.

Wildcats suffer 3rd-consecutive road loss

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LINCOLN, Neb. — K-State couldn't find an answer to its mounting road woes Wednesday, dropping a 71-64 lackluster effort to Nebraska.

"Give them credit," said coach Frank Martin. "They came out there and played with a lot more passion than we did, and they deserved to win."

K-State (18-6, 7-3 Big 12 Conference) had a 6-2 lead to open the game, but Nebraska slowly whittled away at K-State's lead, taking it away from the Wildcats at the 11:28 mark on a three-point shot by sophomore guard Sek Henry.

"We came out the first half, and we didn't play well," said senior guard Blake Young. "We would try to make a run and they kept coming and we would give up easy baskets. If you want to win on the road, you can't give up easy layups."

The Huskers (15-9, 4-7 Big 12) extended their lead in the first half to eight points. K-State forced one tie in the first half and got as close as one twice in the first half but could never mount a significant scoring streak.

The Wildcats took the lead in the second half at the 15:57 mark, but within a minute and a half, senior center Aleks Maric made a jump shot to claim the lead for the rest of the game.

K-State cut the lead to one with 4:52 left on a three-point basket from Young, but Nebraska scored the last six points of the game to effectively shut down the Wildcats. Martin said he was more disappointed by K-State's defensive problems than in its offensive production.

"I thought it was the most embarrassing performance of any team I've ever coached," he said. "In 23 years of coaching, it's the most embarrassing defensive performance of any team I've ever coached, and that's including 13-year-olds."

Freshman forward Michael Beasley finally got going offensively in the second half, adding to his first-half point total of five and finishing with 17. He also pulled down 10 rebounds for his 22nd double-double, which ties him with Carmelo Anthony for most double-doubles in a season by a freshman.

Also in double-figures for the Wildcats were freshman guard Jacob Pullen, who finished with 15, freshman forward Bill Walker, who had 12 and Young, who had 10.

Junior guard Steve Harley led the team in scoring with 20 points. Maric added 15 points (as well as 17 rebounds) and sophomore guard Ryan Anderson had 11. Nebraska out-rebounded K-State, 33-29. The Huskers shot almost 52 percent from the floor, their second-best percentage of the year. Young said though he felt the talent level was higher for K-State, mental miscues are plaguing the Wildcats.

"I felt like we're better as a team, and we should be winning these games," Young said. "We're just having mental breakdowns and not getting the job done like we should be."

Largest beef recall stems from animal mistreatment reports

By David Griffin Jr.
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The largest beef recall in U.S. history might raise prices and cause concern in other parts of the country, but K-State likely will not be affected.

On Sunday, the U.S. Department of Agriculture recalled 143 million pounds of frozen beef that came from a Southern California slaughterhouse, according to CNN.com. The slaughter house is under investigations for the mistreatment of cattle.

Dick Raymond, undersecretary of agriculture for food safety, said there was a very small chance that the beef could cause illness to humans, according to CNN.

The recall stems from a video showing Westland/Hallmark Meat Packing Company employees kicking cattle, ramming them with a forklift and hitting them in the ears in an attempt to force them to go to slaughter, according to CNN.

Though the recall concerned many consumers across the country, none of the meat was shipped to the Manhattan area.

"The beef product here at Kansas State was not affected," said Michael Dikeman, professor in animal sciences. "The only recall was in California."

There are many procedures taken to protect campus beef products, said Ryan Breiner, assistant instructor in animal sciences.

"The beef is safe here at Kansas State," Breiner said. "There should be no worries."

We have multiple locking safeguards for our product."

CNN explained further that officials estimate that about 37 million pounds of the recalled beef went to school programs, but they believe most of the meat probably has already been eaten. There have been no reported illnesses linked to the beef at any of the schools.

The USDA called the recall a "Class II" recall, which it defines on its Web site as a health hazard situation where there is a remote probability of adverse health consequences from the use of the product.

Sheila Lauery, a corporate Dillons employee, said the recall has not affected beef sales at the store.

"The beef recall did not impact our stores," she said. "We did not sell any of that beef product that were recalled. It really doesn't impact Dillons."

On Friday, California prosecutors announced animal cruelty charges for two former Westland/Hallmark employees, according to the CNN report.

The United States Department of Agriculture categorizes recalls into three classes, depending on the risk posed by consuming the product.

- Class I: Reasonable probability of serious adverse health problems or death
- Class II: Remote probability of adverse health problems
- Class III: No adverse health consequences

Play confronts issues of race, couples

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The poetic, off-broadway production "Platanos and Collard Greens," proved there is little difference between black and brown skin tones, though they might originate from a different country and speak a different language.

The production, which has been performed at more than 100 colleges and universities across the nation, performed at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall. The K-State Black Student Union and Hispanic American Leadership Organization co-sponsored the play as part of Black History Month events.

The play reenacted David Lamb's book, which is based on his own personal experiences of being a black man dating a Dominican woman. The production featured the story of two college students attending Hunter College in New York. The characters, Freeman and Angelita, struggle to sustain their interracial relationship that is not accepted by society or by Angelita's mother.

"The message we are trying to portray is unity," said Phillip Smith, who plays Freeman. "A lot of the students we meet can relate, interracial dating is a universal thing."

"Platanos and Collard Greens" addressed these issues with thoughtful poetic stances in almost every scene.

"We try to spread the word that people who are Latin are African as well," Doni Comas, director of the play, said. The history of Latin culture was incorporated into the production to give the audience an insight of where stereotypes come from as well as tracing Latin roots to Africa.

Freeman's character also provided an insight into what it's like to be a black man trying to be successful in today's society and political scene by running for student body president.

"[The play] also opens the door to address the issues that some people may not know how to address," said Osas Ig-hodoro, who played Malady, Freeman's running mate.

In the end, the couple realizes that their own personal satisfaction is more important than what society acknowledges as socially acceptable.

"It just so happens to be a Latina and a black man, but it could be anything. It's just an example used to address the bigger picture," said Carissa Torro, who plays Angelita.

Scripts for "Platanos and Collard Greens" change nationwide Comas said. The cast has about four scripts that they have to memorize and perform. Production is also changed to fit the Latino demographic that particular geographic region is most familiar with, Comas said. For example, when the production plays in California they will change the original nationality of Angelita, which is Dominican, to Mexican to better relate to the audience. In Manhattan, the cast chose to keep Angelita with her original nationality.

About 100 people, mostly students, filled the main section of Forum Hall. The play received good reviews from students.

"It spoke the truth about what stereotypes Latinos and blacks have to endure," Ciara Slater, freshman in animal sciences, said.

K-STATE FACULTY

Professor specializes in terrorist studies, draws on OK City bombing experience

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Craig Stapley came home one day from his job as a senior casualty claims adjuster at Farmers Insurance Company Inc. in Oklahoma City. Stapley told his wife that he hated his job, and he wanted a change.

"You're miserable," Stapley's wife told her husband. "Figure out what you want to do, and do it."

With a bachelor's degree in Japanese already under his academic belt, Stapley went back to school. He received master's and doctoral degrees in public administration and political science, respectively.

His doctoral dissertation covered subject matter that most Americans rarely discussed prior to the Sept. 11 attacks — terrorism. But for Stapley, terrorism served as an academic study and real-life experience years prior to 2001.

On April 19, 1995, the then-deadliest act of terrorism in the U.S. took place at the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. As a casualty claims adjuster, Stapley said he visited the site and had to reclaim property. The experience affected Stapley's future academic studies.

"It just seemed right that I study terrorism because the Oklahoma City Bombing had such a profound impact on those of us that were around it at the time," he said. "Then Sept. 11 happened, and the things that I was studying suddenly became relevant on a much wider scale."

Stapley is the executive director of K-State's Security Studies MA/Ph.D. Program,

K-STATE CLUBS

KSU Juggling club aims to expand group

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former marine reintroduced the Juggling Club to the list of clubs available at K-State in spring 2003.

Ryan Bradburn, graduate student in public health, said after juggling in the military, he wanted to continue juggling at K-State, but the juggling club was no longer in existence.

Bradburn called the graduating members of the club and used their knowledge and expertise to get the club started again.

"It didn't have a lot of interest at first, but in the fall of 2003, we got a few high-skilled and energetic jugglers," Bradburn said.

Taking on the role of president for the first years of the club's existence, Bradburn said he thought it was important he find others to fill the role of president to keep the club going.

Along with the weekly meeting Thursdays from 6 to 8 p.m., students involved in the club have attended juggling festivals across the nation.

The club started the Little Apple Juggling Festival, which is in its third year and will be Feb. 22-24. Bradburn said students had been to juggling festivals in the Kansas City area and thought it would be nice to have a festival locally.

"The first year the festival was kind of small, and last year it was bigger," Bradburn said. "This year it will be even bigger, and people from all over will be coming."

There will be two shows during the festival — a professional show and a variety show. Jugglers and newcomers also can attend workshops to learn new tricks or classes to help teach the basics.

"It will be a weekend of juggling," Bradburn said. "I really enjoy the juggling community here — getting together and creating festivals to bring people together to have a great time."

Kirk Preston, club president and senior in biological and agricultural engineering, said he has not been to any juggling festivals but the one in Manhattan.

Preston said he became involved with the club his freshman year after signing up at the activities carnival.

"I kind of knew how to juggle before, but it was a neat novelty club I thought would be fun to join," Preston said.

The club, Preston said, has 15 consistent members and draws in more interested students when the weather is nice.

"It is just a nice break from the monotony of school," Preston said. "I enjoy being in the club because it is something else I can do with my time."

Austin Roberts, senior in mechanical engineering, said the club is an activity he had been doing since middle school.

"I met people that were pretty good at it and saw a chance to improve by joining the club," Roberts said.

He said he wanted to join the club after walking past a weekly meeting and remembering he knew how to do some tricks.

Roberts said his favorite aspects of the club were the social events and the shows the club would do for charity or donations.

"It is really fun being in this club, and the people are great," Roberts said. "It is not hard to improve. All you have to do is just practice."

DRUGS | Woman tells story of rape

K-State Police Captain Don Stubbings said though the three main date-rape drugs are GHB, Rohypnol and Ketamine, other drugs can be used such as cold medicine and narcotics like cocaine.

KATE'S STORY

Kate wished to remain anonymous in this story, and certain details have been held for investigation purposes.

Kate met P. when he moved to her hometown, near Wichita when she was a senior in high school. He was the new kid, and Kate said she felt bad for him the first time she saw him because he was sitting all alone, so she asked him to sit with her and her friends.

Later that year P. moved, but they kept in contact.

When Kate was a freshman, in December 2006 she went back home to visit her family for Christmas break. P. was also in town and he kept calling her, wanting to hang out. At about 9 p.m. on Dec. 23, Kate and a friend went to a party where P. was at. They played a drinking game called Quarters, and Kate drank two small drinks. Kate said P. told her that her drink was not strong enough, so he and his sister went into the kitchen to make another. When he came back out, Kate said he and his sister were looking at each other oddly and grinning.

Kate drank what they gave her, and she said soon after she could feel her body reacting.

"I couldn't walk straight, and everything was pretty flashy," she said. "I don't remember a lot of things from the evening. It was like a strobe light."

P. convinced her he could take her home, and so they left the party and he took her to his step-sister's home.

"I just remember being in the guest bedroom and he was on top of me and he started kissing me and the next thing I knew my pants were off and he was having sex with me," she said. "When I came to, I told him no, ... and he just said 'no, no Kate, you know it feels good so you shut the fuck up,' and I blacked out again."

The next day, Christmas Eve, Kate said when she woke her head felt like someone had hit it with a brick.

"I knew that he did rape me and for how long or what else he did, I didn't know."

Kate said she didn't know what to do. She told her brother, and soon after she told her parents who were supportive. They took her to the hospital to check for sexually transmitted diseases, which she tested negative, and then they filed a report with the police, telling them everything that had happened.

"They had plenty of evidence," she said. "I had the underwear. I hadn't washed them or my jeans. He didn't even take the underwear off when he raped me, so they had semen on them."

RECOVERY

Kate is now attending K-State. It has taken her a year and two months, and she is finally ready to publicize her story, however nothing has been done to her rapist. Though Kate said she and her parents filed the police report, not even a warrant has been issued for P.'s arrest.

She said her recovery has been long and difficult.

"It just took a lot of time and a lot of sleep," she said. "I basically threw away two semesters of school because I couldn't even get out of bed because it was easier to just sleep then have to think about what was going on."

Kate wrote a journal entry about how she was feeling:

"I constantly feel like I'm on the verge of crying, but I won't let it out because I think it will be easier to just hold it in. I haven't been eating very much because after I eat I feel really sick to my stomach. I just feel sick with myself. I hate looking in the mirror anymore, because when I do, I hate what I see. I think about it, what happened."

She said a friend referred her to the Women's Center and to Mary Todd. Through talking to them she connected with a counselor, and she said finally she has been feeling more like her previous self.

"I have always been a really strong person," she said. "Nothing ever has gotten to me, and obviously this has to get to you. I'm not bigger than this problem and it broke me, and it still breaks me every once in a while, but I've learned healthy ways of dealing with it."

As Kate has been improving, she said she realized how much her rape had affected her overall.

"He took away me," she said. "He stole me. He stole my identity. He stole my personality and what I did and what I thought was right and what I felt safe doing."

DEBATE | Candidates answer questions of environment, safety

make it a more green-friendly campus?

-Glazier said K-State can talk to professors and try to switch to a paperless system. He said many people are worried about bottles and glass, and he said K-State should look more at what we're printing assignments on.

-Cox said he and his running mate, Piper Hoskins, junior in economics and political science, want to throw their full support behind an effort to get recycling not just between every building on campus but inside all of them as well. He also said solar energy could easily be installed for the Union and the rec, and savings could be realized by the time freshmen leave campus.

-Peele said going green is absolutely necessary. She explained that K-State is getting a lot of new buildings on campus, and they are working to make the buildings "green." She said K-State received a D+ on a test of environmental sustainability.

-Schurr insisted that with any green initiative there needs to be specific studies. He said solar cells atop the Union might provide only half the energy needed. He said he's not an expert in solar but knows a lot about "the winds."

"Even I would need council from experts, from those who know," he said.

-Culver said he noticed a "recycling truck thing" on the way to class, and he said K-State obviously has a recycling program, but it's not good enough. So as ninjas, he said, they will keep campus clean and eliminate all pirates and their "dirty ways of trashy filth."

"You elect pirates, and you're gonna get an F," he said.

What do you plan to do to make K-State safer for students?

"Who knows what to do when there's an emergency situation?" Cox asked. Cox said he and Piper would like to revamp the freshman orientation classes so they provide that information to students. He said he did not want to make the classes mandatory but wanted to make them valuable. He also said he wants to increase lighting on campus and make the Women's Center more visible.

"It's absolutely necessary," Peele said. She said K-State is not doing enough right now, and the university needs to find out exactly what needs to be done to prepare students and staff for the worst. She said she wants to start by increasing the number of police officers on campus from 6 p.m. to 3 a.m.

"We also want to make sure the parking garage is making safety a priority as well," she said.

-Schurr agreed with Cox on the lighting issue. He said the lighting will help root out the ninjas where they might be hiding in the shadows. Schurr said the ninja crime issue is bad. Schurr said he will incorporate a "defense against the martial arts" course.

-Culver said he already has placed ninjas all over K-State. He said they are there for students' protection.

-Glazier said he has more experience in this area than the other candidates because he was part of the Johnson County Sheriff's Office. He said the campus police are understaffed but are definitely doing their job to their best abilities. He said K-State needs to give them the tools to improve their working capacity.

STAPLEY | Professor uses memory of Sept. 11 as reminder of his goals

60 percent of the program's students, he said.

"The program really gains from having such a depth of diversity in terms of our student population," Stapley said. "What you get when you add those different perspectives really is synergistic in that the end result is much greater than the sum of the parts."

Less than seven years ago, Stapley said terrorism was not a mainstream study — he said he was considered a "kook." In 2006-07, he served as an academic fellow with the Foundation for Defense of Democracies in Israel where he studied terrorism with other terrorism researchers.

"People that studied terrorism were on the fringes of political science," he said. "Since that time, I think people have understood the need for a systematic and empirical study into terrorism."

Terrorism is very real in Stapley's life, he said. He often is asked how he sleeps at night with the knowledge he has about the subject area. A small bumper sticker is taped on Stapley's desk that reads "Caution: stay 110 meters back or you will be shot" in English and Arabic.

Stapley's brother-in-law, who works as a dog handler in Iraq, sent Stapley the sticker that covered his Blackwater truck.

"It's pretty sobering and pretty hard to deal with it sometimes," he said. "The way that I choose to deal with a lot of these things is through humor. Obviously for me, that's a joke. For them, it's all too real, sadly."

Other symbols of Stapley's academic studies surround his office. Books on understanding terrorism fill his bookshelf. A small bust of Abraham Lincoln sits on his desk and a painting of George Washington hangs on the wall. The U.S. had significant forefathers — Stapley calls these men "some of his many heroes."

But one poster hangs past the bookshelf and desk that serves as a daily reminder for Stapley. At the top of the poster is a photograph of the New York City skyline with the Twin Towers that reads "Never Forget ...". The poster's bottom portion shows a post-Sept. 11 skyline with the message "Why we study this subject."

"I love this poster," Stapley said in a quiet voice, pointing to the wall. "It helps explain what I do."

ONE MORE TIME ANTIQUES

McCain to feature influential classic play

By Adrienne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A classic Tennessee Williams' play with modern-day TV show plot parallels will make a stop at K-State this weekend as part of the McCain Performance Series.

The Montana Repertory Theatre will present "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at McCain Auditorium. The play features different levels of relationships with Southern patriarchal and romantic themes, said Thom Jackson, McCain assistant director for marketing and development.

The play features Big Daddy Pollitt, a wealthy Mississippi plantation owner. Unaware of his terminal cancer, Big Daddy celebrates his 65th birthday with his sons, Brick and Gooper, and their families. Jackson said Big Daddy's classic character could be compared with Tony Soprano from TV's "The Sopranos."

"It's about controlling the relationships between men and women during that time where boundaries and lines are drawn," Jackson said. "It's a test of authority when people have been beaten down so many times they're going to lash back."

The play also features Brick's wife, Maggie, who loves Brick, but he ignores her and their strained marriage because of his alcoholism. Maggie unsuccessfully tries to capture Brick's attention with another relationship, which Jackson said is like a modern-day "Desperate Housewives" plot.

"She tries to manipulate him and make him jealous by playing up to another man, and you can see how well that doesn't turn out," Jackson said. "It's just such a powerful show, and I think that's why it's such a classic because it asks you that 'what if' scenario."

Richard Brooks' 1958 "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" screenplay adaptation featured Elizabeth Taylor and Paul Newman and was nominated for six Academy Awards. Williams also won a Pulitzer Prize for Drama in 1955.

The McCain Performance Series last featured "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" about 20 years ago, Jackson said.

Though the language was altered in the 1958 movie adaptation, Saturday's performance of "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof" will include adult language and subject matter, Jackson said.

Tickets are $12.50 for K-State students, $23 for K-State faculty and $25 for the general public. For additional ticket information or to purchase tickets, go to www.k-state.edu/mccain or call the McCain Box Office at 785-532-6428 between 11 a.m. and 5 p.m. weekdays.

Audience members are invited to stay after the performance to discuss the play and the repertory with the Montana Repertory Theatre.

Campus cafés offer variety of cappuccinos

Campus cappuccinos

Reviews by Alex Peak

One part espresso, one part milk and one part frothed milk equals 100 percent of bouncing off the walls — or a cappuccino.

Our campus caters to those in need of a coffee buzz quite well with options like the Cat's Den and Caribou.

CAT'S DEN (STUDENT UNION FIRST FLOOR)

Grindmaster Cappuccino Machine
Flavors: white chocolate caramel or French vanilla

Sizes: 12, 16 and 24 ounces
Cost: (tax included) $1 (12 ounce), $1.15 (16 ounce) and $1.30 (24 ounce)

Review: The cappuccino tastes too much like hot chocolate and is extremely sugary. There's not much of a coffee taste, and I don't think there's really much caffeine. Patrons are more likely to get a sugar high or cavity than anything else. The drink is thick in texture, syrupy and leaves a nasty after taste. Be sure to chug some water or brush your teeth afterward. On the positive side, the lines are usually pretty short and prices are affordable. Keep in mind you get what you pay for — which isn't much.

Café Q (ENGINEERING COMPLEX)

Barista-made cappuccino made with Kaldi Coffee espresso

Syrup flavors: Vanilla, almond roca, caramel, cherry, chocolate mint, cinnamon, coconut, hazelnut, Irish cream, mango, peppermint, raspberry and strawberry. Sugar-free syrups include vanilla, caramel and hazelnut flavors.

Sizes: 12, 16, or 20 ounces
Cost: $2.55 (12 ounce), $2.95 (16 ounce) and $3.45 (20 ounce)

Review: The drink has a good balance between milk and espresso. Kaldi Coffee has strong flavor, but it's not rich enough to hide the bitter coffee aftertaste. The nice thing about Café Q is that the baristas ask if you'd like a "wet" — more milk — or "dry" — more froth — cappuccino. The customized drink orders and friendly baristas are a plus.

CARIBOU COFFEE (UNION FIRST FLOOR)

Barista-made cappuccino with Caribou's own brand of coffee

Syrup flavors: Caramel, marshmallow, raspberry, mint, vanilla, cinnamon, almond, Irish cream, cherry and hazelnut.

Sizes: 12, 16, 20 ounces
Cost: $2.65 (12 ounce), $3.20 (16 ounce) and $3.50 (20 ounce)

Review: There's a good mixture of froth, milk and espresso in these cappuccinos. The drink has a very bold taste; you definitely can't miss the coffee flavor. With Caribou's coffee, if you're not a serious espresso lover, you might need some sugar or a flavored syrup to relax the concentration. Don't drink this cappuccino unless you plan to bounce off the walls all afternoon.

BOOKEND CAFÉ (HALE LIBRARY GROUND FLOOR)

Barista-made cappuccino with Starbucks brand espresso

Syrup flavors: almond, amaretto, caramel, cherry, chocolate, chocolate mint, cinnamon, creme de menthe, coconut, hazelnut, Irish cream, praline, strawberry, raspberry and vanilla

Sizes: 12, 16 or 20 ounces
Cost: $2.90 (12 ounce), $3.20 (16 ounce) and $3.50 (20 ounce)

Review: As usual, Starbucks products have smooth flavor and little to no after taste. The flavor is rich and perfected, and the cappuccino has an appropriate balance of espresso, milk and foam. However, the cappuccino-making process seems a lot more robotic and machine oriented than at Café Q or Caribou Coffee.

Coffee, both in the K-State Student Union; The Bookend Café in Hale Library; and Café Q in the Engineering Complex. With a variety of places and prices, students have the opportunity to find the drink for them.

I took a trip across campus to try each location's cappuccino. Some were great, some terrible and some gave me a caffeine hangover from which I'm still recovering. Ratings are given in cappuccino mugs.

Charlie Bartlett (R)

Charlie Bartlett has been kicked out of every private school he ever attended. And now that he's moved on to public school, he's simply getting pummeled. But when Charlie discovers that the kids who surround him — the outcast and the popular alike — are secretly in desperate need, his entrepreneurial spirit takes over. Hanging up his shingle in the Boys' restroom, Charlie becomes an underground, not to mention under-aged, shrink who only listens to the private confessions of his schoolmates, and makes the imprudent decision to hand out the pills he's proffered from his own psychiatric sessions.

The Duchess of Langeais

(NR)

Antoinette is the Duchess of Langeais, a married coquette who frequents the most extravagant balls in 1820's Paris during The Restoration, where hypocrisy and vanity reign. Upon the handsome general, Armand de Montreuil's first meeting with her, he realized it was true love from that moment on. Flattered by his attentions, the alluring Antoinette orchestrates a calculating game of seduction, but she repeatedly refuses Montreuil. Despite his sincere romantic declarations, Montreuil's passion remains unfulfilled.

The Counterfeiters (R)

Salomon "Sally" Sorowitsch is the king of counterfeiters. He lives a mischievous life of cards, booze and women in Berlin during the Nazi era. Suddenly his luck runs dry when arrested by Superintendent Friedrich Herzog. Immediately thrown into the Mauthausen concentration camp, Salomon exhibits exceptional skills there and is soon transferred to the upgraded camp of Sachsenhausen. Upon his arrival, he once again comes face to face with Herzog, who is there on a secret mission. Hand-picked for his unique skill, Salomon and a group of professionals are forced to produce fake foreign currency under the program Operation Bernhard. The team, which also includes detainee Adolf Burger, is given luxury barracks for their assistance. But while Salomon attempts to weaken the economy of Germany's allied opponents, Adolf refuses to use his skills for Nazi profit and would like to do something to stop Operation Bernhard's aid to the war effort. Faced with a moral dilemma, Salomon must decide whether his actions, which could prolong the war and risk the lives of fellow prisoners, are ultimately the right ones.

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

5th year: Befriend architecture students; claim studio to hang out

I made the mistake of befriending all architecture majors, and now they're never around. I'm bored. How can I hang out with them?

ADAM
REICHENBERGER

Go on down to Seaton Hall, and go into room 110. Ignore the redhead and hippie to the right, the clean-cut gentlemen to your left and head toward the back of the room. In front of the windows you'll see an empty drafting table with the name Justine taped across the top. If you browse through the drawers you'll find two yo-yos, a pack of Bazooka Joe bubble gum and Gary Larson's "Far Side" collection, "The Curse of Madame C."

Justine's mine. This semester I was awarded an honorary desk and locker in the architecture studio. It took me three and a half years of bugging the hell out of them and "accidentally" ruining their projects for them to realize I should have a desk of my own so maybe I'd stop messing with theirs.

I have the utmost respect for architecture majors. I admire their determination, hard work, motivation and talent. Conversely, since they're all my friends, I loathe their determination, hard work, motivation and talent.

You could just cut your losses, write them off as a lost cause, and go on with your life. But if you've gotten this far, you're well aware if you're friends with one architect, you're friends with 20. One could be fairly painless and easy to cut out of your life, but 20? That could leave a dent.

They're like hippos. They go everywhere together, smell awful, shed water like a hot tin roof, have freakish disproportionately small ears, and if you make eye contact, they're likely to stab you in the chest with a giant tooth. I don't know why they travel in herds; they just do. You invite one to a party, and a line of 17 is sure to trail.

They'll ask, "Mind if I bring over a couple architect buddies?" And you'll say, "Sure, the more the merrier." Then they'll show up at your door and enter one at a time with your friend in front introducing, "Here's Joseph, Eric, Kelly, Anthony, Scott, Nolan, Cletus, Nadine, Josephine, Jacqueline, Roberto, Jonesie, Stevesie, Linda, Carla ..."

Instead of writing them off, I chose to keep them around by going to them. I staked out their studio and set up camp. I went in all the time, and if they weren't there, I'd leave a note, maybe something like: "I farted in your chair," or "one of these pens has been in my pants ... I'll let you figure out which."

I ate there, I studied there, I read there, I relaxed there, and unbeknownst to them, I slept there too.

No, it's not easy being an architect's friend. They're moody, they're reliably busy, they don't build Starbucks models when you ask, and lately, they've been loading Justine with all their crap. People will do what they want to do. And if you've got lots of time and want to keep your friends, you'll have to go see them. They're not going to stop doing what they do until those five years are up. Try getting your own desk. Just leave Justine alone — she's mine.

Education for all

Students urged to receive flu shot

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Though the influenza vaccine might not protect all of its recipients against every type of the virus, Manhattan health educators are continuing to urge students to guard their immune systems and invest in the vaccine.

The flu vaccine is 80 percent effective, said Francis Koopman, physician assistant at Mercy Regional Health Center. He said there are many strands of the flu, and pharmaceutical companies develop the flu shot each year by identifying the strand most expected to break out during flu season.

Monitoring which specific strands of the virus are appearing in the summer months prior to the typical winter flu season allow pharmaceutical companies to predict which strand will be most widespread and create the vaccine for that particular year, Koopman said.

"It's important to do all you can to prevent yourself from contracting the flu," said Theresa Doyle, health educator at Lafene Health Center. "Each year, particular flu strands are going to be more prominent than others. The shot doesn't guarantee you won't get flu-like symptoms, but it lessens the chances of getting it. It just depends on which strand is in the area."

Lafene has given more than 1,000 flu vaccines this season and no longer has vaccine in stock, Doyle said. However, Mercy Regional Health Center still is offering the vaccine to the general public.

Koopman said he thinks the idea that the vaccine does not protect its recipients against the virus is a misconception. The flu vaccine provides some degree of protection against the virus no matter which strand the patient is infected with, he said.

"It is very important to get the flu shot prior to flu season," Koopman said. "Primary flu virus predictions can change a bit — people can still get the common symptoms. However, if you get the shot, it gives you some immunity even if you get another type of influenza. Students should protect themselves as much as they can."

DREAM Act stirs emotions on both sides of immigrant issue

By Monica Castro
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Of the 2.8 million students who will graduate from U.S. high schools this year, some might go to college or serve in the military while others will not have the same opportunity.

This situation will affect about 65,000 teens because their parents are illegal immigrants, according to the National Immigration Law Center Web site.

The Development, Relief, and Education for Alien Minors Act, also known as the DREAM act, was introduced in the U.S. Senate in November of 2001 to solve this issue, but was never passed as a national law. Kansas is one of nine states that have versions of the DREAM Act.

Under the provisions of this act, children who entered the United States five years before the act and under 16 at the time of entry are eligible for a six-year conditional residency status after they earn an associates degree or two years of military service.

With good moral character, the applicant can apply for U.S. citizenship after their six-year conditional residency.

This act remains a controversial issue among citizens because it benefits children of illegal immigrants by allowing them to continue their education.

Samuel Ornelas, senior in kinesiology and advocate of the DREAM Act, said the act would benefit children of undocumented parents because they would receive the same options and financial aid to help pay for college.

"This is going to help people and not hurt people — it will help the economy, the state economy," said Ornelas, who is also a member of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization. "It will break the cycle of poverty, because educated people will add to the economy."

Several students who are involved in various organizations on campus, like HALO and Sigma Lambda Beta Fraternity, Inc., say the act not only benefits the offspring of illegal immigrants but will also benefit society as a whole.

Ornelas said the DREAM Act is important to him because he is from a Hispanic community in southwest Kansas.

Hispanic people, he said, are one of the largest illegal immigrant communities.

"It affects us [Hispanics] because we grow up with these people, they might be mine our family, brother, sister, or relatives," Ornelas said. "They don't have a voice and we have to take the responsibility to be their voice."

As a Hispanic, Ornelas said, he thinks if no one does anything, no one

K-State Rodeo starts tonight at Weber Arena

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Rodeo begins tonight and calf roping, bull riding and goat tying will dominate Weber Arena all weekend.

Doug Muller, KSU rodeo coach, said about 16 teams from universities, community and junior colleges from Kansas and Oklahoma will participate this weekend.

"We have contestants spread out throughout the weekend," Muller said. "There is not one night that is all K-State. I think people would enjoy themselves if they came out to watch and support the Cats."

Most of K-State's rodeo members, both men and women, will compete in the weekend's events. Muller said he thinks K-State will compete well in goat tying, barrel racing and calf roping, and he said there is a member of the team that is good at the team roping event.

"The girls are in really good shape as far as being where they need to be," Muller said. "They're taking a step up."

As for the men, Muller said there is a lot of talent, "just not a lot of luck" in the events.

"You have to draw for stock," Muller explained about the events. "If you don't get from middle of the herd to the better end, you have a hard time competing."

Beth McQuade, program chair for the KSU Rodeo Club, said each day of the rodeo will feature a main event.

"I'm really excited," McQuade, junior in animal sciences, said. "There are a lot of new and exciting things, and I hope this year's rodeo is one of the best we've had in a long time."

Tonight is Tough Enough to Wear Pink night, which encourages everyone in the audience to wear pink to help support breast cancer research. McQuade said the winners of each event will receive an extra $25 prize, donated by K-State Collegiate Cattlewomen. Kay Fechter, administrative assistant in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, said advanced tickets can be purchased for $8 for adults and $4 for children ages 6-12.

FLU FACTS

- Every year in the United States, five to 20 percent of people get the flu.

-More than 200,000 people are hospitalized from flu complications.

-About 36,000 people die from the flu.

Bus aids disabled students, faculty

By Whitney Noe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the current parking situation many students would love to be dropped off in front of their classes every day, however, for K-State student Ashley Wagner this service is a necessity.

Disability Support Services provides free shuttle bus services to K-State students and faculty with permanent disabilities and temporary injuries, like Wagner, sophomore in psychology and pre-med, who is quadriplegic and uses a power wheelchair.

DSS has been around for more than ten years and offers the shuttle bus as an extra service that is a vital asset to K-State campus, said Jaclyn Anderson, assistant director of disability support services.

Since there has been a recent increase in the amount of disabled students, the university added another shuttle bus to accommodate the newcomers. There are currently two buses that carry 14 riders; five permanent and nine temporary. Permanent riders include those who are in manual or power wheelchairs and temporary riders are those on crutches.

Anderson said many people think that the shuttle bus can take all students. However, it remains policy that the shuttle can be used only on campus and only for students with actual handicaps.

"We have our policy because students live all over campus, and it would be almost impossible to pick up everyone that lived off-campus," Anderson said. "We have to set limits or we wouldn't be able to service the students we have now."

Sanjay Beharry, one of the full-time shuttle bus drivers, said all students have different schedules and the increase in the number of riders can make it hard to transport them around campus.

"It is difficult at times to get from point A to point B with all the traffic and student crosswalks, but we do our best to get students to their classes and back to their dorms on time," he said.

Beharry became interested in driving the shuttle bus around campus because he has been around people with disabilities and wanted to use his expertise to help others.

"My niece is in a wheelchair and working with her inspired me to take this job position to allow me to give a little more to the K-State students," Beharry said.

There are two shuttle bus drivers that operate the shuttle buses and Wagner said if it wasn't for them, it could be much more difficult for her at K-State.

SHUTTLE BUS HOURS

The Shuttle Bus Service operates between the hours of 7:15 a.m. and 5:15 p.m., Monday through Friday, when classes are in session.

"I like riding [the bus] because the drivers are really amazing," she said. "They are funny, kind, patient and they are the big part in getting me to where I need to go."

Beharry said he enjoys his job, having been a shuttle bus driver for a year and a half now, and he said he realizes how important the shuttle bus service is to the students.

"They are all very happy and appreciative for the services and everything we do for them," Beharry said.

The shuttle bus is privately funded by K-State as a courtesy service. Anderson said she would like to see the university invest in some kind of bus system for all students, but for the moment she is happy with what is currently offered to the students with disabilities.

"It really is a splendid thing that our administration has offered this when they don't have to spend money on it," Anderson said.

Disability Support Services addresses link between violence and disabilities

By Whitney Noe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thousands of disabled U.S. citizens are abused every year by family members and caretakers.

This reality, and many others, were addressed during a lecture as part of "A Season for Nonviolence" Thursday evening at the K-State Student Union.

Among the topics discussed were: disabilities and violence, women with disabilities and reporting crimes, and creating a safe environment.

Jaclyn Anderson, assistant director of DSS, and Jason Maseberg-Tomlinson, adaptive technologist specialist of DSS, revealed several statistics about the understated relationship of disabilities and crime.

"People with disabilities are 4-10 times higher at risk for becoming victims of crime than people without disabilities," Anderson said.

"Ninety percent of people with disabilities will be sexually assaulted and only 3 percent will be reported."

The event was sponsored by Empower Cats, a new student group created to increase understanding about individuals with all types of disabilities, and ACTION through the Women's Center.

"The statistics were very overwhelming, said Lauren Porterfield, freshman in public relations. "I never would have thought any of that stuff would happen."

Some of the statistics showed a very low reporting rate of crimes of disabled individuals. Anderson said there are many reasons why most of the crimes on persons with a disability aren't reported. One of the biggest reasons for disabled person to not report a crime is when the offense came from the main caretaker and, if reported,

"there is nobody else to turn to help them with their disability. Another reason is the fact that many people stereotype those with disabilities and question their credibility," Anderson said.

Tomlinson and Anderson also mentioned a few school shootings that have occurred within recent years and some misconstrued conceptions that many people obtain from them.

In the Virginia Tech and Northern Illinois University shootings, both portrayed violence coming from mental illness or emotionally disordered individuals.

In actuality, people with mental illness are more likely to be at risk of violence rather than portray it, Anderson said.

"I guess a lot of college students don't see these kind of things so it really just teaches us to be more aware," Porterfield said.

No more bra-burning

Movements have progressed much since 70s

One has only been exposed to major media representations, the two most significant social movements of the 20th century – civil rights and feminism – have become typified by left-over hippies and ultra-perms as we have entered the 21st century.

But if we look beneath the surface of popular presentation, we find movements that have continued to evolve to deal with the growing concerns of the modern global community.

Within the fully defined categories of the "third wave" of feminism, the voices of third-world women are starting to make their way into the mainstream feminist discourse. Now those voices and perspectives have sparked a great deal of international organization, applying first-world resources to third-world problems.

The Feminist Majority Foundation Web site provides information on many ways to get involved in global activism.

There are opportunities to partner with women in Afghanistan by supporting the Afghan Women Empowerment Act of 2007, which states "that the protection of the rights of women and girls in Afghanistan and their full participation in the reestablishment of democracy are essential to Afghanistan's reconstruction, and to achieve such reconstruction, the U.S. government must commit resources to advance the rights of women throughout Afghanistan."

Or you can support women in Iran to protest the detainment of women's rights activists. In 2007, several U.S. Congress representatives reintroduced the Global Democracy Promotion Act, a bill that would "repeal the Global Gag Rule and release much needed funds for international family planning programs."

Even right here on campus, organizations like Fair Trade Advocates are trying to link consumers directly to the producers of goods around the world. By working to create a more equitable system of global trade, they can address issues like fair wages, gender equity and safe working environments.

I've been critical of civil rights leaders in the past, but they don't represent the entire scope of black civic activism. Like changes in feminism, increased access to the U.S. system has allowed new and old voices alike to continue the press for civil rights. Organizations like the Southern Poverty Law Center are continuing the fight in a new generation through consistent efforts to fight inequity within the U.S. justice system and by addressing immigrant rights abuses.

Each year the Covenant with Black America publishes a book that details not only the many social issues facing the black community, but also the work in which individuals are engaging to change their own communities. And here at K-State, our own Black Student Union has had the excellence of its leaders and members recognized for its work in the Big 12 Conference.

Many parameters have changed since the early days of civic activism. The types of organizing that typified social and political protest in the 1960s and '70s have been supported and sometimes supplanted by technological advances and increasingly complex cultural identities.

In fact, several of the rights that were so diligently fought for have been realized to some degree.

But the issues that were forced into the public discourse have not entirely disappeared. Continued efforts to increase opportunity and justice for those who have traditionally been excluded is necessary.

As members of the 21st century global community, the best strategy for U.S. citizens is one that deals with both domestic and international policies as intertwined human issues.

TO THE POINT

K-State should look for candidate similar to former AD Weiser

Tim Weiser might not have been the best athletic director in the country, but he was a good fit for K-State.

Weiser, who has been at K-State since 2001, improved facilities for football, baseball, track and field and women's rowing. He also has worked to expand the facilities at Bramlage Coliseum. Several big-time sports including football, men's and women's basketball and volleyball were competitive under his leadership.

CFO magazine ranked K-State No. 7 in fiscal responsibility for athletics departments in the nation. This was impressive since K-State has one of the smallest budgets in the Big 12 Conference.

K-State needs another AD like Weiser. The university, the athletes and the fans need someone who can improve the quality of K-State sports and facilities while saving money.

Since K-State cannot fix its problems by spending more money, it's imperative for the next AD to make solid long-term coaching hires. We don't have the time or money to waste on too many Jim Woolbridges.

Hopefully, Weiser's departure is not a sign of bad days ahead for K-State athletics. However, it seems like Weiser is handing off a strong, stable program.

Coulter uses shock, biased language to remain in spotlight

What I have to say about Ann Coulter could probably take up many more opinion columns.

An extreme conservative, Ms. Coulter has been degrading every person in sight and getting fired from various positions since 1997.

According to Time magazine, she has been fired from MSNBC twice. USA Today fired her as a correspondent for the 2004 Democratic National Convention after she began her scathing review of the event as "the Spawn of Satan convention in Boston."

Additionally, her bi-weekly syndicated news column was dropped from several newspapers in 2005 and 2006, following her fourth book, "Godless: The Church of Liberalism."

Coulter also has been accused several times of taking quotes or articles out of context or even quoting misinformation in her books. The online media outlet Salon.com published an article about Coulter's book "Slander: Liberal Lies About the American Right" on July 13, 2002.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

Article author Bryan Keefer said, "'Slander' is riddled with factual errors, egregious misrepresentations and a constant stream of broad, inflammatory claims about liberals, as numerous critics have been quick to point out. Yet, despite the limits of her one-sided argument, she actually offers a troubling lament for the state of our political discourse – even as she contributes to its decline." Keefer then goes on to cite many examples where Coulter has made false claims about the New York Times and other news media outlets.

Coulter is only adept at stirring up controversy. From her six books to her various media appearances, she contributes nothing to the greater good of political discourse and instead summons amusement and disbelief at her extreme conservative views. Coulter's criticisms of Democrats and liberals are nothing short of stereotypical.

While covering the 2004 Democratic Convention, CBS News cited in her rejected column for USA Today as saying: "My pretty-girl allies stick out like a sore thumb against the corn-fed, no makeup, natural fiber, no-bra needing, sandal-wearing, hirsute, somewhat fragrant hippie-chick pie wagons they call 'women' at the Democratic National Convention."

According to a CNN article on March 4, 2007, Coulter also has been rebuked for calling John Edwards (and Al Gore) an anti-gay slur. She also hinted at the idea that former President Bill Clinton "show[s] some level of latent homosexuality" on the night show "The Big Idea" in 2006.

Whether a person is homosexual, moderate, female, a former president or a veteran, it seems no one is safe from Coulter's wrath. Her inability to fairly see both sides of an issue – and the fact that she is unable to recognize the absurdity of some of her own statements – make what little credentials she has invalid.

Coulter contributes little to the U.S. political spectrum. Unfortunately, her entertainment value has helped her continue her political commentary. But people must remember she is a blackhead on the face of the Republican Party, and Ms.

Coulter never fails to show the political consequences of giving such an extremely closed-minded and biased person the opportunity to speak publicly.

Pirate wants moat around Nichols

Ninja dispels killing misconception

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr, senior in electrical engineering, answered questions about his and his first mate Scott Carlson, junior in electrical engineering, for student body president and vice president.

SCHURR

Why did you and Scott Carlson decide to run for student body president and vice president?
[The ninjas'] underground movement is definitely underway and gaining force daily. They've taken a more public stance. Ninjas are very secluded and dark and secretive, but now they've actually stepped up to run. Our pirate intelligence — our insiders — let us know this was actually going to happen, that [the ninjas were trying to] run unopposed — just against politicians, because politicians wouldn't stand a chance. We knew we had to put together our own ticket. Outside of a crew of pirates, I don't know who could take out a ninja problem like this. The other reason, of course, is that we do have some things that I think we can bring — attitudes, mentalities — that would be beneficial to K-State and students at large. Occasionally, I'll have a student ask, "Well, why would a pirate run?" and I respond with, "Can a pirate do any worse than what we have had before?"

What issue on your platform are you most excited or concerned about?
Today, I was conversing with a fellow, and he thought that it would be appropriate to put a moat around Nichols Hall. I thought about that a moment and I realized that's not that bad an idea. And that's not something I thought of on my own. It's the people in the student body that are going to come up with the ideas. I try to avoid being so attached to an agenda or policies or ideas, so that I can listen to other people.

Do you think being a pirate gives you any advantages over the other candidates?
I think there are a lot of people who say SGA elections are boring and stupid. But talking about the pirate issue and tailgating issue, [they] see purpose in the election now. It's people like that; they inspire me. It's like a rock star who thanks their fans. I know I can count on [those] votes and [they] know they can count on me to take care of their concerns. Sure, some people might just say we're being silly, and in a way, we are. We're bringing fun into politics; we make people smile. The so-called serious candidates couldn't keep a straight face [at the debates]. I know the debate was more enjoyable for them because we were there.

Pirates often get a bad rap and are commonly thought of as pillaging and looting thieves. Do you think you and Scott fit into this category?
In a sense, we recognize privilege fees as pillaging and plundering of students' checkbooks. A very minor plank that I had thought of that may be suitable is to sail up the Kansas River to a small town outside Topeka and go pillage and plunder, especially in the form of sports trophies.

Anything pertaining to the Sunflower Showdown — anything we can pillage and plunder and return [with] victoriously is something I can only encourage and I will be directly participating in. It would boost morale, motivation and pride, all those things that make us proud to be K-Staters.

This is about people, about K-State, about the greater good, whereas the ninjas, I think, hinder all of those.

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jonathan "Ninjitsu" Culver, freshman in chemical engineering, answered questions about his campaign with Nicholas Birdsong, junior in political science, for student body president and vice president.

CULVER

How did you and Nicholas Birdsong decide to become running mates?
Me and Nick met through a friend in the engineering department. We just came up with the idea of a comedy ticket, and so we just needed an extra guy, so we asked some guys, and Nick was one of the guys.

What do you think is the biggest issue for K-State students right now?
The infestation of pirates, and the overflowing of pirates on K-State and how pirates are so drunk all the time, just destroying and wrecking K-State.

If elected, what are the main changes you would like to help implement on campus?

Well, I would definitely destroy all forms of piracy. Pirating music online [is] completely illegal, and ninjas would be safeguarding all Internet pirating, so we would be destroying that too.

Ninjas also would be safeguarding K-State to where there will be no crime whatsoever, because ninjas are here to protect, and we would make all pirates be slaves and clean the K-State property.

Do you think you have a lot of the support from the student body right now?
I do have quite a lot of support from what the pirates have been telling me. When we talk [to students], they say, "No, we're not voting Pirate, we're voting Ninja," and so I have a lot of support from them and from my friends.

All over the world, ninjas are definitely more popular than pirates. I also have "Weird Al" Yankovic on my [Web] site. He agrees that ninjas would destroy pirates any day. That's pretty cool because Weird Al is a celebrity.

How extensive is your ninja training?
Well, there's things I could tell you, but I'd have to kill you. I'm well trained in all forms of martial arts. I've been trained in Rangers and Blackwater, Green Berets, also Alpha to Zulu Bravo Teams. I've done many undercover works, and, of course, if I go into more detail, I'd have to kill you and kill myself too, so I can't tell you anymore.

In the movies, ninjas often are shown sneaking around in the dark, killing people. If elected, would the mortality rate of students on campus increase? Basically, would you kill students?
No. People always say ninjas are here or we're made to kill people, and we are not made to kill people. We are made to kill certain people. We are told who to kill. We just don't randomly go around and kill people. [We're] told who to kill, told who to spy on, told who to annihilate.

So in my form, I am the leader of the Ninjas, so, in a way, I tell them who to kill, who to annihilate, who to spy on. And so K-State, in effect, would be more of a safeguarded home where students could feel safer. I already have ninjas surrounded all throughout K-State. How do you think K-State has been so safe? It's a great place to stay.

By electing ninjas, I can get more, and more, and more and more ninjas to help us out and keep this area safe.

Student Senate passes bill to increase Union minimum wage proportionally

By Brandon Steinert
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate approved an increase in the K-State Student Union operations budget privilege fee Thursday night at its weekly meeting.

The bill was sent back to the privilege fee committee at the Feb. 14 meeting to negotiate an increase in pay for Union employees.

The bill, which was not amended after reconsideration, will increase the minimum wage for Union employees to $7 per hour. Employees already making the new minimum wage or more will receive a 7.7 percent increase in pay, which is proportional to the raise that minimum-wage employees will receive.

Faculty Senate Representative Tim Weninger, graduate student in computer science, argued the increase does not reflect the pattern in other areas of campus.

The Union will be the first area of campus to increase workers' pay proportionally, Weninger said.

Weninger offered an amendment to the Senate, which would compromise between the two sides. He proposed the 7.7 percent increase in pay for those at or above minimum wage should be decreased to 4 percent.

Student Body President Matt Wagner was one of the first to speak in opposition of the amendment.

For us to take away some of that money that they would otherwise see is absurd, Wagner, senior in management information systems, said. He said Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco's offices can pay what they want to pay, but the Union has a pay scale and they believe in the merit of it.

Wagner said the other areas of campus, except Lafene Health Center, did not request compensation to maintain a pay scale, and that is the reason the Union's request didn't reflect the pattern on campus.

Senator Sarah Morton, senior in accounting, agreed with Wagner. She said approving the amendment would imply that Student Senate considers Union employees to be overvalued by their employers.

The amendment failed 2-51-1 and the original bill then moved into debate.

Katherine Beye, senior in political science, said the Union is a more valuable service to fund than some of the allocations approved in the past.

Weninger argued the approval of the bill would be a slippery slope, suggesting it would encourage other parts of campus to apply for the extra funding, which would require more privilege fee increases.

After more than an hour of debate, the bill was voted on and passed 45-9-0.

Senators also voted on an increase in College Council funding from reserves because the amount of allocations requested from student organizations would deplete the current funding by the end of the semester. It passed unanimously. The last day for student organizations to apply for funding is March 7.

Krista Leben, senior in political science, was sworn in as a new senator and will serve as senator for the college of arts and sciences for the remainder of the 2007-2008 school year.

A resolution in support of Northern Illinois University administration, alumni, faculty and students was approved unanimously and was followed by a moment of silence out of

Some allocations were denied in the allocations committee, which meets outside the Thursday meeting, including funding for Delta Chi fraternity to attend a conference and an allocation to Students for the Right To Life.

They were declined because of a lack of educational value, said Allocations Committee Chairman Bryan Cox, junior in political science.

Weiser steps down as AD to take job at Big 12 Conference offices

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Athletic Director Tim Weiser spoke about changes, or lack of changes, in his parting address to K-State on Thursday.

"As I said to my staff today, nothing lasts forever," Weiser said. "We're not going to shut the building down because of my departure. The sun's going to come up tomorrow and we're going to continue to be about the things we've been about. That's the reality of all our jobs: Change comes. Change is a part of our lives."

Weiser, who joined the athletic department in 2001, announced Thursday he was stepping down as athletic director to become the Big 12 Conference's deputy commissioner. K-State President Jon Wefald said there is currently no timeline to find a replacement for Weiser, and he will continue to be a presence in the athletic department through June, said Sports Information Director Kenny Lannou. Associate athletic director Jim Epps will oversee the day-to-day operations until a replacement is hired.

In the seven years Weiser has been at K-State, he has made several improvements to the athletic facilities, a fact Wefald said is one of the cornerstones of Weiser's time in Manhattan. There was a $7 million improvement project to the football stadium, a new track complex, Tointon Family Stadium for baseball as well as a new boat-house for the women's rowing team. Weiser also put into place the $50 million Bramlage Coliseum expansion that will include new practice courts, offices for the coaches and a unified entrance for football and basketball to the K-State Sports Hall of Fame.

"He's brought, first and foremost, keen intelligence," Wefald said. "He did do a search and at the end of the day, he was still interested in talking about this opportunity."

Weiser's serve directly below Big 12 Commissioner Dan Beebe. Beebe first approached Weiser to be his deputy in August, when he accepted the job in place of former commissioner Kevin Weiberg. However, Weiser declined the opportunity because of the timing.

"At the time, I didn't feel like the time was great for us here," Weiser said. "I encouraged him to do a search and see if he couldn't find a better solution. He did do a search and at the end of the day, he was still interested in talking about this opportunity."

"Given the news that was released this week about the NCAA investigation and given the fact that our basketball situation has somewhat solidified itself, the timing was much better to do that."

One of Weiser's most important moves involved offering a five-year extension to women's basketball coach Deb Patterson's contract in 2006. Patterson said because of Weiser, K-State's athletic programs have been more on the national spectrum.

"Tim Weiser's impact has just been phenomenal," Patterson said. "He has been, in my mind, a unsurpassed leader in helping K-State athletics become prominent and a name in collegiate basketball and certainly in the Big 12, where a lot of people were prone not to take to K-State seriously. I think everything begins and ends with leadership, and it's a tremendous honor and distinction that he leaves K-State knowing that he has put K-State on the national map."

With the Big 12 basketball tournament next month and still no deputy commissioner, Weiser said

Men to take on guard-heavy Baylor squad

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After losing its third-straight Big 12 Conference road game, K-State will have little time to dwell as the Wildcats head to Baylor Saturday.

The Wildcats (18-7, 8-3 Big 12) lost 71-64 Wednesday at Nebraska, in what freshman forward Bill Walker said was a continuing lack of focus on the road.

"We haven't played a full game yet, we haven't gone out there and tried to play our way for 40 minutes," Walker said. "I don't think it's anything talent-wise or physically — we just have to compete for 40 minutes."

To get back on focus, the Wildcats will have to stop a guard-heavy team in the Bears (17-8, 5-6) who lost their last game 92-91 to Oklahoma in overtime.

K-State coach Frank Martin said the Wildcats will have to defend the perimeter to stop Baylor.

"They've got five guards that can shoot, pass and dribble and can do it all at a high level," Martin said. "We have to make sure that we guard the three-point line against them."

Baylor has made 218-of-573 three-point attempts this season. Walker said the main concern is with the Bears' ability to move the defense.

"They can spread the defense out, but we just want to go down there and play our style of game because we need to get a win on the road," Walker said.

Despite the fact that the Feb. 2 loss at Missouri was a 12:30 p.m. game, Martin said the team has played its worst in the last two Big 12 losses that were evening games. Martin said the team was going to explore some ways to keep the players from sitting in hotel rooms while awaiting the game.

The Bears are led by junior guard Curtis Jerrells who is scoring 15.4 points per game and junior forward Kevin Rogers who is averaging 12.2 points and 8.4 points per game. The contest will mark K-State freshman forward Michael Beasley's first opportunity to break Carmelo Anthony's NCAA freshman record of 22 double-doubles in a season.

Beasley is now averaging 26.7 points and 11.5 rebounds per game.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

K-State to take on Colorado

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the K-State women's basketball game tips off at 7 p.m. Saturday in Boulder, Colo., senior guard Kimberly Dietz will be in her hometown for the final time in her collegiate career.

Dietz attended Monarch High School in Boulder before committing to K-State.

Coach Deb Patterson said there is nothing better than having an opportunity to go to Colorado and get a win in Dietz's hometown.

"It would be a dream to go to Boulder and put Kimberly in a situation to be successful," Patterson said. "She's been phenomenal for our program and has emerged as a player of the year candidate in this league."

K-State (18-7, 10-2 Big 12 Conference) is coming off a tough home loss Wednesday to the No. 10 Oklahoma Sooners, 68-65, but the team doesn't look at its game against Colorado as a "bounce-back" game. The Wildcats said they look at it as a chance to move forward.

Junior guard Shalee Lehning said she believes if K-State plays their own style of play, they will be able to fly out of Colorado with another Big 12 win, a victory that would be especially sweet for Dietz.

"We just have to stay positive, treat everyone with respect and play hard," Lehning said. "Dietz is awesome. It's her last time to play against Colorado, and we want it to be special. We just have to stay focused."

K-State will have to focus more on post play against Colorado, as the Buffaloes will look to take advantage of their size with Jackie McFarland, who had 20 points and 11 rebounds in the earlier game this season against the Wildcats. Lehning said the Wildcats just have to do their best in trying to stop the Colorado post players.

"Jackie McFarland is a great player, and we just have to do anything we can to stop her," Lehning said.

Colorado (14-11, 3-9 Big 12) is struggling, coming into the game having lost nine of its last 11 contests. With a win against the Buffaloes, the Wildcats would extend their road-winning streak to eight games. But Patterson said the fact Colorado has a poor record in conference play doesn't mean they can't play well.

"Believe me, we don't think about team records because records mean nothing in this league," Patterson said.

Track team to host home meet to prepare for Big 12 Championships

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Competing in its final event before the Big 12 Conference Indoor Championships, the track and field team will welcome several smaller teams to the KSU Open Saturday.

The meet, which will be in Ahearn Field House, starts with field events at 10 a.m., and track events are scheduled to begin at 1:30 p.m. The Wildcats have 18 men and 19 women scheduled to compete in the meet.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said the team has held the open for 19 years and uses it as a way to tune up at home before the Big 12 Conference meet.

"The advantage to our team is they get to sleep in their own beds and don't have to worry about sleeping on buses," Rovelto said. "It's probably better for our kids, and tougher for our coaches, but we certainly didn't want to travel the week before the conference meet."

Because of Ahearn's smaller flat track, the meet will draw mostly smaller schools and will not provide a lot of strong competition for the team.

"I don't think we really have that much competition, so in that aspect, it won't be the same as conference," said senior Laci Heller. "But it will be good to have a nice home meet before the conference meet and not have to travel."

Field athletes, including Heller and sophomore Loren Groves, who both have qualified for the NCAA championships in the weight throw, will be mostly featured at the meet.

"It will give us a good chance to get another mark and hopefully will give us a little confidence," Heller said. "I'm excited. We should throw huge this weekend."

The meet will be most important for the field athletes, who, Rovelto said, need to stay in rhythm before the Big 12 Conference meet.

"Practicing here and getting to compete here is an advantage to us," Heller said. "You just have an advantage because you know how your ring feels because you practice on it everyday."

The majority of the runners will not compete this weekend, particularly athletes that are competing in events that are 400-meters and longer.

After hosting the meet, the Wildcats will compete in the conference championships Feb. 29-March 1, in Lincoln, Neb.

Tennis team to compete against ranked Utah, BYU

By Tyler Sharp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Following a loss against No. 42 Tulsa on Sunday, the No. 68 K-State women's tennis team will face a challenging set of matches in order to get back on the winning track.

The Wildcats, ranked by the Intercollegiate Tennis Association for the first time since Feb. 27, 2007, will face No. 66 Utah today in Salt Lake City. Saturday, the team will travel to Provo, Utah, to take on No. 56 Brigham Young.

Coach Steve Bietau said he expects tough matches this weekend.

"It's always difficult when we go out there," he said. "Utah has a new coach this year that's been pretty successful in the past, that's our first match, and BYU's been a national power for quite a while."

The Wildcats, who had a four-match winning streak snapped by Tulsa in a 1-6 loss, focused on singles play this week. K-State's only win on Sunday came from freshman Antea Huljev in singles play. Huljev notched a 6-1, 6-3 win over Tulsa's Rebecca Row. Huljev said traveling might have made it more difficult for the team.

"We were battling all of us, of course," she said. "Sunday, maybe we were more tired than Saturday with traveling and everything. So I think we did a pretty good job anyway."

Though the team was tired, Bietau said his team has been busy this week preparing for the upcoming matches.

"This week, it's not really a week, it's two practices," he said. "We had the day off Monday and practiced [Tuesday and Wednesday] and [Thursday]. We spent some time looking at video and feel we have a good idea of what we need to improve on."

Meanwhile, K-State's doubles teams also find the key to their past success. The Wildcats' three matches against Tulsa were all close losses after a sweep against Sam Houston State. Freshmen Vanessa Cottin and Pauline Guemas and Huljev and senior Viviana Yrureta had been on three-match winning streaks prior to facing Tulsa. Senior Olga Klimova and junior Katerina Kudlackova also have been playing well, accumulating several wins.

A match-up with Utah will open a busy weekend for the Wildcats. The Utes, 5-3, are coming off a 4-3 win over Nevada. Utah was not able to clinch the win until No. 6 singles player Karine Bourgas notched a 6-4, 7-5 win.

BYU also faced a challenge its last time out. Playing fellow Big 12 competitor Texas Tech, the Cougars topped the Red Raiders 4-3. This match also went down to the wire. Elle Carney, the Cougars' No. 6 singles player, clinched the match with a 6-2, 5-7, 6-3 victory. The Cougars, 4-5, boast several ITA ranked doubles teams. No. 1 doubles team Anastasia Surkova and Jennifer Miccoli is ranked No. 37 by the ITA. The No. 2 doubles team of Dolly Chang and Kristina Doerr is ranked No. 46. Miccoli and Surkova are 6-1 in 2008, while Chang and Doerr are 7-0.

Huljev is confident in her outlook for the rest of the season.

"Expect a lot," she said. "We are focused on the season and trying to do our best."

Baseball team returns solid core of players, receives highest Big 12 preseason ranking

By Joe Bergkamp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time, the NCAA has set an official starting date for collegiate baseball.

Universities in cold-weather states will no longer start their season while some teams in warmer climates already have twenty games under their belts. The K-State baseball season will begin this weekend with the Wildcats heading west for a weekend series with Santa Clara and California.

The Wildcats will take on California for two games at 1 p.m. today and then head to Santa Clara for another doubleheader at 3 p.m. Saturday to wrap up the weekend.

This will be the 108th season of K-State baseball. 2007 campaign highlights included the 34-24 record, which was just one short of the most wins in school history, and an appearance in the Big 12 Baseball Tournament for the first time since 2002 and only the 10th time in school history. The 10-16 Big 12 Conference record was also the most conference wins by the Wildcats since 2002.

People outside the Manhattan fan base are beginning to take notice of the Wildcats, as the team was picked to finish seventh in the preseason Big 12 poll, their highest ranking ever. Returning from 2007 are seven position starters and 11 pitchers.

The No. 1 and No. 2 spots in the starting pitching rotation appear to be locked up with seniors Brad Hutt and Chase Bayuk, respectively. The rest of the rotation is still in the air, but juniors Ben Hornbeck and Justin Murray also will be in the mix. Also pitching for the Wildcats will be pre-season All-American senior reliever Daniel Edwards.

"It has potential ... with the guys returning that we do," said coach Brad Hill. "The talent level has increased here, but it's still potential. Brad Hutt and Chase Bayuk have a track record here, but we need to use our talent to become more consistent."

This pitching staff definitely has the potential to be the backbone, but they need to go out there and establish themselves."

As far as position players go, one of the Wildcats' best hitters, junior Byron Wiley, will return for K-State. Wiley hit .366 last season, with a team-high seven home runs, 44 RBI and 42 runs. Wiley was one of only two Wildcats who hit over .300 on the season, but Hill said he expects Wiley to be better protected in the lineup this season.

"He was kind of a sitting duck in our lineup last season," he said.

Freshmen Carter Jurica and Jason King could be solid additions to the squad. Jurica, a native of Katy, Texas, was a Louisville Slugger All-American his senior season, when he hit .529 with 13 doubles, five home runs and 42 RBI. King comes to Manhattan from Dublin, Ohio, where he hit .396 with 10 home runs in his senior season en route to becoming the No. 1 Ohio high school recruit.

Last season ended without an invitation to the NCAA Tournament, despite playing in the Big 12 Tournament.

To help their cause this season, the Wildcats have beamed up their nonconference schedule. Three teams from the preseason Top 10 are on K-State's schedule with seven teams that advanced to the NCAA Tournament, with two of those (Arizona State and UC Irvine) advancing to the College World Series. Play won't get much easier when conference play begins; last season, two teams, (Texas A&M and Oklahoma State), advanced to super regionals.

This season, four Big 12 teams are ranked in nearly every preseason poll.

"It's a great opportunity for our kids to compete in those types of situations," Hill said. "It's good for the program. If you want to take the program to the next level you have to challenge your team. The goal is to take this team to the next level and the upper echelon of the Big 12."

PROUD campaign raises more than half of $60,000 fund-raising goal

Matt Binter | COLLEGIAN

K-State PROUD student volunteers sell T-shirts in the K-State Student Union on Thursday. Students wearing their PROUD T-shirts today will receive a free scoop of purple pride ice cream in the Union during the lunch hour.

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State PROUD campaign is halfway to its fund-raising goal as of Wednesday night, said Cole Galyon, campaign co-chair.

With $31,455 raised from student donations, Galyon, junior in marketing, said the student response for the campaign this year has been "amazing," but he said he hopes students continue to contribute.

"We really want students to [donate] as soon as possible," he said. "I'm sure we still have plenty of T-shirts, but they're going fast. We're really excited to see it all tie together on Big Monday in Bramlage when everyone is wearing their shirts."

Galyon said it's almost impossible to know how many T-shirts have been sold so far, but "it's got to be way up there."

Molly Hamm, Student Foundation vice president of student relations, said the objective of the campaign is to raise awareness about the importance of philanthropy to K-State students, and to continue to establish funds for K-State PROUD awards.

"We want students to be aware of what it means to give back to the university, and how they can do so even when you're on a college student's budget," Hamm, junior in English, said.

There are two awards funded through the campaign. The PROUD award is given to students who are anonymously nominated by students or faculty members and who have exhausted all possible financial options. The Hero award also is chosen through anonymous nomination and is given to students who have contributed greatly to K-State, Hamm said.

Overall, she said she is thrilled with students' increased awareness about the campaign and the support they have shown this year.

"More than ever, people are educated on the fact that it is about donating to the campaign," she said, "and they understand the purpose behind the campaign rather than just seeing the T-shirt. I think people are more willing to give to the campaign because they know how much of a difference it made to students last year."

Hamm said after the ESPN Big Monday basketball game on Monday, she hopes the campaign will continue to raise awareness about philanthropy and the university and encourage students to give back to the school any way they can.

"Whether they can give or not," she said, "we hope to keep creating something that is exciting and keeps students wanting to be involved and wanting to donate."

DREAM | Opponents contend bill violates immigration law

ever will be able to help immigrants overcome barriers to succeed. Ornelas stressed immigrants did not just include Hispanic people but all types of immigrants.

"The system is broken, the U.S. needs immigrants to do jobs that Americans don't want to do like agricultural business," Ornelas said.

John Exdell, associate philosophy professor, said the DREAM Act would also help the economy because children of illegal immigrants will be able to learn and use their knowledge and to be productive.

New immigrants are greeted with "nativistic attitudes" by some people, who think non-citizens cannot bring anything productive, Exdell said. He added with a growing population it is useful for the society to have younger, educated people to be productive as a way to support the older generation.

"I think we should encourage the DREAM Act to provide residences with equality of opportunity," Exdell said.

While some K-State students and faculty support the act, many others strongly oppose it.

Douglas Shane, freshman in animal sciences and industry, said he wants the U.S. to help children an education, but he said it should be done within the boundaries of the law.

"It is not fair to have someone have better or the same accessibility that someone that has already been here," Shane said.

Shane said he thinks the U.S. government would have to increase taxes because of the influx of students, making necessary products harder to afford for U.S. citizens.

"The money is taken out of someone's pocket and put into someone else's pocket that may have not earned it," Shane said.

The DREAM Act is a violation of U.S. law, Shane said. In order to maintain a fair citizenship he said he thinks the U.S. government should find a better way to get people into the country legally.

Shane said most Americans think emotionally rather than rationally about the DREAM Act.

Americans who think more emotionally want to help out people just because they care, without thinking about the consequences, he added.

"I don't think amnesty is fair to our citizens, founding fathers or people waiting to get into the country," Shane said.

WEISER | Weiser takes assistant position with Big 12 Conference

Beebe became urgent in his quest to bring Weiser into the Big 12 offices.

"From Dan's standpoint, he's been operating roughly six months without a right-hand guy," he said. "I understood the urgency he was feeling and the need to have somebody who could be there for the day-to-day operational standpoint, especially with the conference tournament coming up."

Weiser is only the second athletic director to be promoted to the conference offices in the history of the Big 12. The first was Donnie Duncan, who was a former athletic director at the University of Oklahoma. Bob Burda, assistant commissioner for communications of the Big 12, said Weiser will bring an "institutional perspective" to the conference offices in Dallas.

"Obviously, it's very exciting to bring somebody of Tim's stature to the conference office staff," he said. "With 20 years of experience as an athletic director and close to 30 years experience on a campus, we view that as a tremendous asset."

It will be hard, Weiser said, to make the transition. He will have to take an unbiased perspective in the offices, making decisions based on what's good for the conference. Although Weiser will begin familiarizing himself with the office as soon as next week, he said he still sees room for improvements at K-State and will still try to make some of those changes reality, particularly the proposed athletic facility expansion.

Wefald said though he was sad about seeing Weiser go, he wishes Weiser luck in his new position.

"I was very happy for Tim Weiser and I have sadness about him leaving Kansas State University," Wefald said. "He has done an extraordinary job for K-State as the athletic director. We're happy for seven years he was here, and we wish him the best."

FLU | Health educator says shot is protective against flu symptoms

Koopman said he is encouraging everyone to continue to invest in the flu shot. It takes two weeks for the vaccine to develop an immunity response in its patient, and flu cases are extremely common until May, he said.

"It's important to do all you can to prevent yourself from contracting the flu," Doyle said. "Each year, particular flu strands are going to be more prominent than others. The shot doesn't guarantee you won't get flu-like symptoms, but it lessens the chances of getting it. It just depends on which strand is in the area."

Some recipients of the vaccine said they think the flu shot is effective in protection against the virus.

"I've gotten the flu shot every year," said Elizabeth Devlin, junior in journalism and mass communications. "I have asthma, so I'm at high risk to contract the flu. I also work in a nursing home, which is a high-risk population. Even with these things, I've never gotten sick with the flu shot."

Lynda Bachelor, coordinator of the K-State Volunteer Center, said she had worked in high-risk environments in the past and had also gotten the flu shot every year, which protected her from ever contracting the virus.

"I decided I wasn't at the risk level I had been involved with in the past to receive the flu shot this year," Bachelor said. "This year is the first year I hadn't gotten the shot, and now I'm sick. I definitely think the shot protects people against getting the flu."

FLU VACCINE TIPS:

- A flu vaccine is the best way to protect against the flu.

- Getting a vaccine is very important for people at high risk for serious flu complications and their close contacts.

- This year, an all-time high supply of vaccine is available, so more people than ever can seek protection from the flu.

- Because flu season can last as late as May, getting a flu vaccine now still can be beneficial.

4 local restaurants lend support, money to cancer-research fundraiser

By Amanda Keim
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

* "Booyah" is the term chosen to represent the recent community effort to combat cancer.

Kicking off its campaign on Feb. 15, the Booyah Benefit for Cancer Research is taking its own path to fundraising.

Four local businesses - Vista Drive In, Planet Sub, Domino's Pizza and Baskin-Robbins - have teamed up to help fight cancer.

"Booyah is a term that represents feelings of euphoric celebration upon fighting through extreme adversity and overcoming daunting obstacles, and we're using it in this context to emphasize our belief that we will conquer cancer in our time," said

James Sperman, benefit organizer.

Unlike the average fundraiser, Booyah does not require potential donors to exert any extra effort or spend any extra money.

Individuals are asked to visit the aforementioned businesses rather than purchasing food elsewhere between now and March 16.

Each business calculated its average monthly profit, and any profits above that monthly average will be donated to cancer research.

"I'm hoping we can raise $50,000 and that would require roughly doubling the sales of these businesses," Sperman said. "That may seem like a lot at first, but you have to consider that it would require only roughly 10 percent of individuals to switch their purchasing to these companies."

All of the money raised through the month will be donated to the Terry C. Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Sperman said the money will be donated in the name of Vanessa Stewart, the mother of K-State men's basketball player Clint Stewart, who recently died because of bone cancer.

"We use our funding to support our mission in three ways," said Dr. Rob Denell, director of the Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research. "We support basic cancer research, we support education of training undergraduates and we support regional outreach. In all of those areas, we are very much limited by our available resources."

It is because of these limited resources that Sperman made the decision to donate his extra time to this fundraiser and increasing cancer research efforts, and Denell said the cancer center appreciates the efforts.

"I'd like to thank James and his colleagues for their commitment and hard work on our behalf," he said.

Of about 20 businesses Sperman approached, four agreed to participate in what Chad Wilson, manager of Planet Sub, called "an interesting marketing strategy."

"I was just really curious to see how well it would work and it's nice to see money be donated to charity," Wilson said.

Wilson said Planet Sub does not plan to offer any special promotions during this time but instead will rely on the efforts of Sperman and his colleagues to increase sales.

"We had a really good weekend and Monday was really good," Wilson said. "Sales have been really good so far but we'll have to wait and see."

Sperman said he plans to continue Booyah again next year and hopefully generate more participation from local businesses.

"It's extremely important [to participate]. First of all, it will raise money right off the bat for cancer research, and secondly, it will tell other businesses to participate in these kinds of events in the future," he said. "This is about people helping out right now and taking a stand."

Booyah offers interested parties many ways to become involved.

Individuals might put a sign in their yard that reads 'We Support the Booyah Benefit for Cancer Research,' purchase a hamburger from the local Vista Drive In and urge friends, family and co-workers to do the same.

As the fight against cancer continues to affect millions, Sperman urges individuals to become involved in any way possible.

He emphasized that participating in the Booyah Benefit is as simple as ordering a pizza from Domino's.

"Please support the event because it won't cost you any more time or money than you would spend going elsewhere," Sperman said. "The only effort it requires is the effort to shop conscientiously."

JUST A NOTE

Student remembers musical gift

A young girl sits at her grandmother's piano. She plays "Hot Cross Buns." She can't read the music in front of her, but she pretends anyway. The grandmother plays "Tea for Two," and the girl and her younger sister dance along.

ADRIANNE DEWEESE

At night before she falls asleep, the girl dreams of playing the piano during a recital. Her hair is pinned up in loose curls, and she is wearing her favorite pink dress with flowers. The girl's family members applaud when she finishes.

For her eighth birthday, the grandmother pays for her granddaughter's first month of piano lessons. The girl doesn't have a piano of her own, so she walks one street over to her grandparents' house each day, and she practices. She learns the notes' names. Her short fingers stretch to reach the keys.

Three months later, she is at her first recital. She performs an arrangement of Ludwig van Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9." Her grandmother frames the picture of her performance and puts it on top of her chest of drawers.

A young girl memorizes "Let There Be Peace on Earth," her grandfather's favorite church hymn. She performs it at her next recital. She learns songs like "Can You Feel the Love Tonight" and "Beauty and the Beast" and plays them for her classmates during elementary-school talent shows.

One year later, the grandmother buys the girl her very own piano at an auction. The piano is gorgeous in the girl's eyes — a tan Baldwin, with a worn bench where her predecessors sat and practiced.

Her grandparents' 50th wedding anniversary takes place at a small-town Catholic church one spring day during the girl's adolescent years. The girl practices her piece for months, writing in correct fingerings for notes she stumbles over. She practices certain measures until she gets them correct. The song isn't a traditional church hymn, but the girl thinks it is perfect for her grandparents — "When I Fall in Love." They love it.

Over the years, the girl performs at recitals and church masses. She takes up another instrument — the clarinet — but her love remains deep with the piano. She continues her lessons into her collegiate years, though she is not a music major. Composers like Beethoven and Franz Schubert appear on her iPod — their piano melodies relax her.

She listens for piano melodies in modern-day rock music, and she wishes she could play keyboard in such a band. Keyboardists and pianists still are her favorite musicians. Her best friend gives her a piano book of Coldplay songs one year for Christmas, and the girl plays their melodies and wishes she could write such inspiring music.

Today, the girl is a grown young woman. She has a different set of keys beneath her fingers now. I am that young woman. In 1994, my grandmother Mimi paid for several months of piano lessons. I took them for 12 years.

Next Friday, on Feb. 29, Mimi will turn 80 years old. But 14 years ago, she made a little girl's dreams come true. Thank you, Mimi, for the best birthday present I ever received.

MOVIE REVIEW

Fool's Gold reasonable

"Fool's Gold"

★★★★☆

Review by Brendan Praeger

After the surprisingly entertaining "How to Lose a Guy in 10 Days," it was only a matter of time before Kate Hudson and Matthew McConaughey teamed up for another romantic comedy.

"Fool's Gold," their latest movie, makes the most of their charisma in an average but entertaining comedy.

When a clue to the whereabouts of a lost treasure rekindles the married couple's sense of adventure and their estranged romance, they team up with a millionaire and his spoiled daughter to solve the mystery.

The plot structure resembles a video game more than a movie. They find a clue that leads them to another clue. Repeat several times. Fight a boss battle. Show off the treasure. Roll credits.

The love story, usually the main draw in a romantic comedy, takes a back seat to the lackluster adventure story.

I would consider that a spoiler, but the plot is so predictable that anyone who can't tell what happens from the movie's trailer probably lacks the literacy to know the difference.

Luckily, the movie is entertaining, even without a brilliant narrative.

McConaughey and Hudson worked harder on their abs than their acting, but the physical comedy and warm scenery should be enough to please most viewers.

The movie's largest downfall comes from the secondary characters. The interesting ones are underdeveloped, and the others are too annoying to warrant their screen time.

As a romantic comedy or an adventure movie, "Fool's Gold" isn't necessarily that good, but sometimes that's good enough.

Residents 'Plunge' to raise money

By Yvonne Ramirez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Braving the cold waters of Tuttle Creek Lake, members of the Manhattan community and K-State's Phi Beta Sigma fraternity came together Saturday to take the "Polar Bear Plunge."

The Plunge, a nationwide event in which people dive into a cold — sometimes even frozen — local body of water, helps fund the Special Olympics through donations made to the teams who take the plunge.

The Special Olympics is a year-round training program, as well as educational and athletic competitions, for individuals with intellectual disabilities, according to the Special Olympics Web site.

The Phi Beta Sigma fraternity was the only K-State fraternity to participate in Manhattan's Plunge, and most participants were from the community with organizations like Wal-Mart. "This was our second year doing the Polar Bear Plunge," said Montae Robinson, senior in horticulture and landscaping.

The fraternity dressed up as "geeks," wearing slim-fitting jeans, suspenders and glasses. They let out a loud yelp as soon as they hit the 41-degree water, helping to win them "the most enthusiastic jump award."

The members of the fraternity were able to raise several hundred dollars for the event.

"We set up a booth in the [K-State Student] Union as well as a Web site that people could go to for donations," said Demarkus Coleman, Phi Beta Sigma historian and sophomore in business administration.

Community members and businesses also participated in the Plunge to help raise money for the Special Olympics. Wal-Mart employees helped out by hanging signs inside the store to promote and raise money for the event said Derrick Reinerio, a Wal-Mart employee.

According to the Plunge's Web site, www.kssso.org/polarplunge, this was the third-annual Polar Bear Plunge at Tuttle Creek.

Last year's plunge raised more than $23,000, part of more than $109,000 raised statewide. This year's event exceeded that total, raising about $30,000 organizers said.

52nd-annual KSU Rodeo thrills contestants, viewers

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wrangler jeans, straw cowboy hats and distressed brown and black boots were the dress code this weekend at the 52nd-annual KSU Collegiate Rodeo.

More than 20 universities and colleges from Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma competed in the festivities, some bringing home the gold and some leaving with the enjoyment of the atmosphere that only comes once a year.

A general consensus of favorite events was bull-riding.

The men's rodeo events included bareback riding, tie-down calf roping, saddle bronco riding, steer wrestling and bull riding. Women's events included breakaway roping, goat tying and barrel racing. Team roping was a coed sport.

Weber Arena was packed on Saturday, allowing standing room only. Doug Muller, K-State Rodeo coach, said overall he was pleased with the turnout of about 10,000 people over the weekend.

"I think it went really smooth; the students and the team worked really hard to put the rodeo on — besides competing in it," Muller said.

The KSU Rodeo is one of the largest rodeos in this region, Muller said. Though most audience members were rodeo goers, some were there to experience something new and weekend recreation.

"I really enjoyed the rodeo," said Ricky Scott, Junction City resident. "This is all new to me, and a lot of the events look really dangerous. I came up here just as something to do, and I'm really glad I did. I'm very impressed."

There were no injuries reported.

Man charged with drug possession

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was arrested on Thursday for possessing marijuana with the intent to distribute, among other charges, according to a police report.

Joshua Michael Eubanks, 1332 Flint Hills Place, was arrested under a search warrant as part of an ongoing investigation into the sale of marijuana in the Manhattan area.

Eubanks was charged with possession of marijuana with the intent to distribute; felony possession of marijuana; felony possession of drug paraphernalia; and three counts of endangerment of a 7-year-old child.

No injuries to the child were reported; this charge was due to the fact that drugs and the child were in the same house, said Riley County Police Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

Eubanks was also charged with two counts of selling marijuana; two counts of unlawful acquisition of drug proceeds; two counts of unlawful use of telecommunication device; and was charged three times for not having a Kansas drug tax stamp. Eubanks was not confined. He was released on Thursday after paying a bond of $10,000.

Concerns arise about speed, reliability of K-State Internet technology

By Holly Campbell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A recent Associated Press article by Peter Svensson raised the issue that the increasing popularity of video downloads and other high-bandwidth activities may overwhelm and slow the Internet.

Is K-State prepared to handle the surging popularity of Internet videos and larger file downloads?

Internet service providers usually oversell their available bandwidth, which means a few heavy users can make the Internet seem slow for the provider's other customers, said Daniel Andresen, associate professor of computer and information sciences.

K-State has not really had any issues related to Internet capacity, but the university's bandwidth was increased last summer, said James Lyall, associate vice provost of information technology services.

However, there is disagreement over whether K-State needs to do more to address potential problems.

K-State has not done enough to keep up with bandwidth demands and has not taken simple steps, like upgrading and expanding server storage space, said Tim Weninger, graduate student in computer science.

Though some K-State staff members have been receptive to concerns about Internet technology, the university has a lot of catching up to do, Weninger said.

"Music, torrents and especially streaming sites, like [YouTube.com], are eating up bandwidth that is putting a load not only on K-State's campus, but on the global infrastructure as well," Weninger said.

World-wide, illegal downloading has been one of the most significant factors in causing Internet slowdowns, Svensson said in his article.

Weninger said he approved of K-State's prevention of file-sharing, because it saves students and the university from potential lawsuits and reduced the potential amount of traffic for K-State's network.

Even without illegal downloading on campus, some students might not be satisfied with the current conditions of the university's Internet technology.

Some graduate students in computer science have left K-State because of the dire circumstances related to Internet issues, Weninger said.

As issues continue to develop, administrators might have to make changes to the university's Internet technology.

TODAY 1933: 1ST DRIVE-IN MOVIE DEBUTS

Invented by Richard Hollingshead, the first drive-in debuted on Crescent Boulevard in Camden, N.J. Admission was 25 cents per car and per individual, with no car paying more than $1. Hollingshead received a patent for his idea in 1933, but it was later repealed in 1939. Without a patent to hinder them, copycats began opening up drive-ins all across the country. By 1938, most metropolitan areas had drive-in theaters. The drive-in craze would reach its peak in 1963 when 3,502 theaters were in operation across the country.

TUESDAY 1993: WORLD TRADE CENTER BOMBED

After the attack, authorities evacuated 50,000 people from the buildings, hundreds of whom were suffering from smoke inhalation. The evacuation lasted the whole afternoon.

Local poets share humorous, melancholy works at Poyntz Gallery

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jo Vanderhyde carefully unrolled the toilet paper to reveal his poem stuck inside on bright green paper. This piece of work was called "Snot."

Vanderhyde, graduate student in English, was one of about 10 poets who read their works at "Poetry on Poyntz" Friday night at the Strecker-Nelson Gallery, 406 1/2 Poyntz Ave. The event occurs once each semester and gives people an opportunity to share their writing and listen to others' poems.

Jay Nelson, owner of the art gallery, said he created this event because he enjoyed hearing poetry. He said he graduated from K-State with a master's degree in English, but he said he is better at writing critically rather than creatively.

"Poetry is something I'm interested in," Nelson said. "Anybody can read; anybody can come. We've had so much fun with it that we've done it for five years now."

He said many K-State students come to the readings, showing an appreciation for poetry that has not always been present at the university.

Manhattan residents filled the seats as well. After the 40 chairs had been filled, there were still between 10-15 people left standing in the bright and clean exhibit room where the readings took place.

"That people in Manhattan would come out on a cold night to listen to poetry, I think is very remarkable," Nelson told the audience.

Lisa Eldridge, an undergraduate in English, said she gave up shyness years ago. She was the first to leave her seat in the audience to read her poem called "Blank Page." It was about the frustrations of writer's block.

"I like hearing the different types of work," Eldridge said of the poetry night. "They are all very different types of styles."

Rachel Moore, graduate student in English, read three poems full of nothing but prepositions. The first consisted of the word "Without," repeated about 20 times; the other two were titled "With" and "Out." Each of these words was repeated in four different languages with a range of inflections, whispers, and gravelly tones.

"It's supposed to help you think about the meaning of prepositions ... 'cause that's fun," Moore said.

The poems came in all shapes and sizes and provoked a wide range of emotions from the responsive audience. Up-roarious laughter to thoughtful silence and sympathizing murmurs swept audience members as the poets read their works one after another.

Shaunte Montgomery, graduate student in English, read several serious poems about the portrayal of African-American women. Montgomery's first poem was called "Ode to Celie," a character from "The Color Purple."

"Some people think that if one person acts this way, then all African Americans must act this way," Montgomery said. "What does our reputation say to people of the dominant culture? African Americans have to be propaganda for how we portray ourselves."

Alcoholic beverages and snacks - including a cake that Vanderhyde decorated with plastic animals and one of his poems written in icing - were served free of charge to the audience. Nelson invited the audience to look around the gallery and socialize before and after the readings.

HIT OR MISS

The editorial board selects Hit or Miss topics and writes them after a majority vote. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

HIT | KSU COLLEGIATE RODEO

Though parking was a bit of an issue, it was good to see attendance was still strong for the K-State Rodeo. Some events even drew crowds larger than the facility could seat.

MISS | POTHOLES ON CAMPUS

Anyone who has driven on campus has probably noticed the monstrous potholes on our streets. Come on, this is Kansas, not Missouri.

HIT | UNITY BETWEEN CAMPUSES

This week's Student Senate meeting will be Tuesday in Salina. It's good to see the two campuses increasing communication.

MISS | START OF HOUSING RUSH

It's that time of year again. The housing rush has begun. Hopefully, future landlords won't make this already stressful time worse.

HIT | K-STATE IDOL

Don't miss the chance to see K-State's most talented acts this Tuesday. Hopefully, none of K-State's candidates will sound as bad as William Hung or look as bad as Sanjaya.

MISS | LESS-HUMOROUS OSCAR'S SHOW

Because of the writers strike, Viewers didn't get to hear as many jokes from Jon Stewart, who was hosting the awards show.

Lack of role models evident in common society, entertainment

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

Most Americans wouldn't see a cold-blooded killer as a fitting role model for their children, but that is exactly the person one church congregation chose to teach its youth about morals and responsibility.

According to www.CNN.com, Texas minister Calvin Inman turned himself in to police as the alleged murderer in an unsolved 1994 murder. Inman said that at age 16, he and a friend stabbed a convenience store clerk to death after the man refused to sell the underage boys tobacco.

Now, in jail at age 29, Inman's congregation of 800 people have forgiven their former youth minister and continue to look to him as a positive influence on their children.

"I am thrilled my son has a role model to accept responsibility the way Calvin has," said congregant Robin Thac.

Another church staff member said she thought that "[Locking] him away someplace and saying he owes it to society is robbing the next generation of a mentor."

How can people be so understanding about such a disgusting act? Just because someone confesses to a crime doesn't mean he or she can escape the retributions of his or her choices. Besides, it takes someone of considerably less character and mental state to repeatedly stab someone who was simply doing their job.

However, this raises another interesting question. If we aren't comfortable depending on someone who made a mistake 13 years ago then who are we supposed to look to in teaching today's youth about dreaming big and making the right decisions?

The Merriam-Webster Dictionary defines a role model as "a person whose behavior in a particular role is imitated by others."

Parents would like to think that they are the ones who act as such a person for their children, but at least for the formative years, children only refer to their parents' behavior subconsciously. At age 9, they would rather outwardly mimic Paris Hilton.

Drew Bartlett, disc jockey for Manhattan radio station KACZ-FM 96.3, compared children today to those several years ago.

"In the '80s, children were raised [through media and celebrity] to believe that they could be anything, but today's role models teach kids that if you have Dad's money you can get drunk and flash people," he said. "There's no need to achieve."

It is too difficult today to find a true role model in modern society. It seems as though whenever someone new comes to light like Britney Spears or Hilary Duff, they mature too quickly and become objects of the media circus whose goal seems to be picking apart seemingly normal and powerful young people to the point where everyone sees them all too negatively.

My fear is that even Miley Cyrus will be the target of vengeful paparazzi in the next year and thousands of adolescent girls will once again be left without a hero.

Yes, there are wonderful programs like Big Brothers and Big Sisters, but kids have always admired someone living a life they can strive to have one day. Where are the Michael Jordans and Baby Spices for kids today? The closest I can come to a celebrity with power and influence fit for the role model ideal might be Leonardo DiCaprio or Oprah Winfrey, but what 12-year-old is going to watch them and follow their values and actions? It's too difficult and not enough fun.

"I don't have role models; they just let you down," said Scott Smith, sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications. Smith couldn't be more correct. Everyone needs to be more aware of who children are watching for ideas on life and behavior.

Kids need to dream big, but when they perceive glamour as drunken rants and shopping sprees, there needs to be a change.

Latin is not a dead language, sharpens vocabulary skills

I never thought I would say this, but learning the Latin language has changed my life. Many students today would prefer a more modern language — like Spanish or French — that is not "dead," but Latin, I have learned, is anything but dead.

Harry Mount, an Op-Ed contributor to The New York Times, observed that 31 presidents since Thomas Jefferson — who knew Latin and Greek — studied Latin, many of them at a higher level.

In 1905, 56 percent of American high-school students studied Latin. By the 1970s, only 6,000 students took the National Latin Exam.

In 2007, more than

149,000 students took the National Latin Exam, according to the National Latin Exam Web Site. Thus, Latin is alive and well, changing students' lives across the globe.

So what difference does Latin really make? It is a window in which, through the language, one can "gain a glimpse into the past that provides a fuller, richer view of the present," Mount wrote. Latin can help us connect to our roots and understand the Roman influence that is so much a part of Western Civilization.

Aside from historical perspective, Latin also sharpens critical thinking skills and increases one's vocabulary. According to www.promotelatin.org, at least 60 percent of the English language comes from Latin. The five Romance languages all come from Latin as well.

Learning Latin also helps students learn grammar and "cuts down the labor and pains of learning almost any other subject by at least 50 percent," said author Dorothy Sayers in her article in the National Review, "The Lost Tools of Learning."

Latin trains the mind by testing the memory, inevitably improving the logic of any given student. The words are not as straightforward as they appear, having multiple endings in a multiple word order.

Therefore, Latin is not dead. Mount said he hopes that our new generation of students will realize "Roma urbs aeterna; latina lingua aeterna," which translates to, "If Rome is the eternal city, Latin is the eternal language."

I have realized how surprisingly useful it is to know a classical language. And I feel cheated that I was not exposed to Latin at a younger age. Latin should be taught in our public schools — even in elementary school — to help students to understand the origin of certain words and what those speaking and writing Latin are saying.

Besides, it is never too late to tackle a new discipline. Mount wrote in his article that Alfred the Great, the ninth-century king of England, began to study Latin at age 50 in order to be a better ruler.

As the Roman orator and statesman Cicero said, "Whoever is ignorant of the past remains forever a child." Latin is one of our keys to the past, allowing us to move our minds away from ignorance.

No way. That's a bear in a man suit.

To the author of the article about the "Juno" movie: If I had a hamburger phone, you'd be the first I'd call.

I'm not an elevator virgin either, except I did it.

I want to talk dirty to Michael Beasley.

Hey, to the guy in the blue coat with the glasses: Riding your bike in the snow - not such a good idea.

Why is it when a girl says "Let's be friends," the guy was denied, but when a guy says "Let's be friends," the guy's a pervert?

I am hoping someone will take advantage of me this weekend.

Hey, someone please do the rain dance in reverse. I saw it work on Nickelodeon, and I hate the snow.

To the guy in the yellow Mustang I waved at Wednesday night: Could I get a ride?

So, I just burnt my neck while curling my hair — making it look like I have a giant hickey. I'm supposed to go on a first date tomorrow.

It is not wise to swallow beer bottle caps.

I just saw a squirrel own a trash can.

Leroy Jenkins.

The munchies are not for real. They're a state of mind.

To the man who had the turkey sandwich: Mine's roast beef.

To the girl who wasn't invited to South Padre with us: Ha ha, sucks.

I saw three ninjas on campus today. Where are all the pirates at?

There's definitely a pair of racy underwear on the ground outside of Cardwell. How does that happen?

Is anyone else in the Derb Complex annoyed from being woken up at 2 in the morning from a car alarm?

To the girls who judge people as they walk by in the Derb: I'm judging you.

If I cheat on my girlfriend with her twin sister, does that really count?

If Beasley and God got in a fight, who would win? Trick question. Beasley is God.

To the person who had to back up three times to park their car: Oh wait, never mind. It's a girl. Well, no. Women can't drive.

To the boys in Haymaker 403: Quit dropping marbles.

P.S. To the boys in Haymaker 402: Shut up.

Dear Taco Bell: You might not have a line of cars around your building if you stop moving at a glacial pace.

Manhattan is reminding me of the movie "The Birds" right now.

A fortune cookie with no fortune is a bad omen.

Hello, Fourum. Um, may I interest you in changing your long-distance service?

Do only crazy people make the Fourum? If so, boogity boogity boo.

Yo, Fourum: You haven't called me back. I'm getting worried.

Hey, iPod: I see you on YouTube.

Hey, who's running our athletic department now?

Dear Daria: I hate your stinkin' guts. You make me vomit. You are the scum between my toes. Love, Alfalfa.

New, local church targets college students with 'emerging' style

By Joe Vossen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some students say they do not have time. Others think they will not fit in or their lifestyle would subject them to harsh judgment from peers and spiritual leaders. Whatever the reasons, more and more young people are skipping the traditional Sunday service.

The Barna Group, an evangelical research and advocacy organization, said in a September 2006 report only 20 percent of people in their 20s kept the same levels of spiritual activity as they had in high school. One local church aims to attract that age group to a new alternative Sunday service called The Well.

Feb. 10 marked the first meeting of The Well, organized by members of Real Life Church in Manhattan. Whitney McVey, junior in psychology, is a member of the church and one of The Well's organizers. She said one of the biggest challenges for students is finding a church that feels comfortable after moving to Manhattan.

"When I came [to Manhattan] I was lucky and found a great church," she said. "That's not always the case for students. The Well is new, it's non-traditional and hopefully it can be what some students are looking for."

The Well meets at 10 a.m. every other Sunday at the Wareham Opera House, 410 Poyntz Ave. The decision to meet somewhere other than a traditional church building was made to decrease the anxiety some young people have about attending religious services.

"For me, going into a church can be kind of intimidating," McVey said. "We wanted to meet here for people who may be turned off by the idea of church because of certain negative connotations that come along with it. Anyone and everyone can come down. It's directed more to 18 to 26 year olds because that's the population that's turned off by the word 'Christian.'"

McVey said the purpose of The Well was not to "take people away from their home churches," but to create another option for worship in Manhattan. The Well's organizers focused on creating a friendly and inviting atmosphere.

"My job is greeting people," McVey said. "I'll be the first person to run up to you and say 'Hey, what's up!'"

David Kinnan, pastor of Real Life Church, spoke with 80 people in attendance on Sunday.

Kinnan's message was delivered between two segments of live music played with two guitars, a bass and drums.

"I'm the teacher," Kinnan said. "Traditionally known as the sermon or preaching, the teacher will do about 20 minutes of lesson. This is a new worship gathering that we're offering that has a different flavor to it."

Kinnan said the idea for The Well started last May, and he and members of his church have been working to put the service together since then. Kinnan said he wants to attract the segment of the college-aged population that feels disconnected from organized religion.

"If you read the surveys that get done all over the U.S., people typically leave the church when they leave home for college or a job," Kinnan said. "They think it's irrelevant and boring and full of hypocrites. If people think that, let's show them it's not true."

The number of people who attend the first services will determine if the venture continues. If enough interest is generated, Kinnan said he hopes The Well will become a weekly gathering.

"We're leasing the Wareham for four Sundays and we're trying it out," he said. "We'll be doing this every other Sunday: [Today], March 9, and March 30. We'll decide after March 9 if we'll continue doing it. Hopefully we can do this every week."

The Well received its name from the story of Jacob's Well in the New Testament of the Christian bible.

"Jesus met a woman at the well. She was considered socially ugly because she was sleeping with so many men," Kinnan said. "However, Jesus didn't say she was less valuable; he just talked with her about faith. That's what The Well represents - it doesn't matter what you've done in the past or what you're doing now, your value remains the same. The Well represents a place where you can engage people as Christ did."

Lance Stafford is the worship director at Real Life Church and the vocalist and guitar player for the band at The Well. Stafford said he hopes The Well draws people by being "a little bit more to the edge" than contemporary church services.

"There's a catch phrase going around called 'emerging' or 'emergent' to describe the new worship culture of people aged 18 to 35," Stafford said. "The Well is an emerging gathering. The word 'contemporary' comes with baggage. You turn on the radio sometimes and hear contemporary Christian music. Some of it is canned and cheesy sounding. We want [The Well] to be emerging."

Services at The Well are sensory-based and interactive, Stafford said.

Worshippers at The Well can expect small group discussions and artistic activities such as painting and drawing. Besides using music for the worship, guests are invited to write down their thoughts, prayers and feelings in journals at the back of the theater.

"It's going to vary every week," Stafford said. "It will never look the same - there's not a cookie cutter mold we're fitting this around. There will always be music and teaching, but the way that's arranged will probably always be different. We're bringing in those who aren't being spiritually fed anywhere. No one should feel intimidated; it's a welcoming environment, and you may not feel like you're coming to a church service at all."

Rachel Van Hoesen, junior at Manhattan Christian College, attended the first worship on Feb. 10 and said it was the easy-going environment that made it enjoyable.

"The music is upbeat and the atmosphere is good," she said. "I thought it was relaxed, laid back and open. You can come in, bring your coffee and worship together. It was cool. We're here to worship one God just like everybody else."

RODEO | Local queen shares insight

gent manure smell composed the classic, all-American rodeo spirit that some students live for.

Matthew Cornitius, freshman in diesel technologies at Dodge City Community College, said he has participated in every tame-roping event around the Manhattan area for the past two semesters. Cornitius competed in the tame-roping event Friday night, and said he is passionate about the sport because of the adrenaline rush and competition that accompanies it.

Cornitius, who is from Wright, Kan., said he initially became interested in rodeo during his junior year of high school. He said he and his friend found a roping magazine around his house one day, and thought it would be fun to try.

"A buddy and I were bored and just wanted to do something," Cornitius said. "We had the summer off and we both had horses, so we tried it and fell in love with the sport. I've been competing as much as I can ever since."

Cornitius said the progression he has made as a rodeo competitor because of observing other competitors he admires and learning from his mistakes. He said he practices about three times a week on horseback and always aims to make positive improvement with his performance.

"I've learned so much about the sport from other people, which has made me a better performer," he said. "I look at the mistakes I make and the mistakes others make and try to go from there. Right when you think you know it all, you realize there's always something to learn that will make you even better."

Cornitius, who also enjoys hunting, said the personal goal he aims to achieve each time he competes is to make it to the short-round competition and have a good time. He said he plans to compete until he graduates college, and then wants to participate in the Jackpot Ropings.

THE RODEO QUEEN

Jenae Skelton, sophomore in agronomy, is the recipient of the 2008 Miss Rodeo K-State title. She said she believes she achieved this because of her passion to positively represent college rodeo and K-State.

She said in order to win her title, she had to go through a pageant process which consisted of a written rodeo-knowledge test, a horsemanship contest, a personal interview with the rodeo's judges, a modeling competition and speech.

Skelton, who is from Larned, Kan., said this year was her fifth year participating in rodeo pageants.

She competed in her first pageant when she was 12, when her hometown county fair sponsored a rodeo queen contest. She said after that, she began traveling to other counties and rodeos, and has participated ed in seven rodeo-queen pageants since.

Skelton said she has been the recipient of the 2002 Pawnee County Rodeo Princess, the 2003 Plainville Rodeo Queen, the 2004 Ellis County Rodeo Queen, the 2006 Miss Rodeo McCracken and the 2008 Miss Rodeo K-State Queen.

"Participating in rodeo pageants have made me more confident and approachable," Skelton said. "I was very shy when I started competing in pageants, and now I'm a very friendly and outgoing person. I also now understand more about rodeos and its specific events because of the pageants."

Skelton also has competed in team-roping events since her freshman year of high school, though she started riding horses when she was very young.

Skelton said while she used to participate in horse shows, her father was a team roper. She decided to also become a team roper when she got older, which she said is a typically male-dominated event in rodeo.

"The rodeo is the ultimate classic-American sport," Skelton said. "It's my favorite sport, and I compete for fun — it's a family oriented event for me."

INTERNET | K-State needs many online-related improvements

"We have not experienced any issues related to capacity, but we will certainly continue to talk with our constituents about their needs, monitor our utilization and take any steps necessary to support the university," Lyall said.

Increased online traffic could reshape the Internet, according to the article.

The Internet is growing so rapidly that there are more computers being connected than there are network addresses, Weninger said. New technology and standards are being developed to cope with those problems.

Some Internet service providers have put unannounced bandwidth limits on users and cut off service to customers who exceed those limits, according to the article.

However, those limits would only affect the few users that used unusually high amounts of bandwidth.

K-State's total Internet usage has been monitored, but individual users are not. The rate of increased demand for the Internet has been consistent with growing demand for other on-campus technology-related resource, Lyall said.

The Internet increases mentioned in Svensson's article were not new and people would adapt to issues as they arose, Andresen said.

"It's nothing we haven't seen before, in the sense that each wave of new functionality on the web generates a surge of new usage, which companies adapt to, and the Internet moves on," Andresen said.

Still, Weninger said he believed K-State still needed many Internet-related improvements.

"We need Enterprise e-mail, calendar and messaging as soon as possible," Weninger said. "iSIS - which was taken from the LASER project, which was largely a failure - must be successful. And that's just for this year."

Beasley's game wasn't enough

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WACO, Texas — Freshman forward Michael Beasley scored a career-high 44 points, breaking Big 12 Conference and K-State records, but it wasn't enough to overcome a balanced offensive attack from Baylor as the Bears picked up a 92-86 victory Saturday at the Farrell Center in Waco, Texas.

"I was just trying to help my team," Beasley said. "I don't want to talk about the points. Obviously, I didn't score enough."

He scored 28 points in the first half, which broke Kevin Durant's record for most points in a half in Big 12 play. His 44 points was the most scored in Big 12 history in a conference game. It broke the record of 43 points set in 2001 by Missouri's Clarence Gilbert.

It was also Beasley's 10th 30-point performance, which ties Bob Boozer's career 30-point performance record. He also broke Carmelo Anthony's 2002-03 record for double-doubles by a freshman — Beasley now has 23.

Freshman forward Bill Walker added 31 points. It was the first time two K-State players had at least 30 points in the same game. It also was the first time this season the Wildcats have lost when they've scored more than 80 points.

K-State (18-8, 8-4 Big 12) started the game on a 12-5 run, capped off by a three-point shot from Walker at the 15-minute mark. However, Baylor battled back into the game, with the go-ahead basket at the 9:35 mark by freshman guard LaceDarius Dunn.

"We didn't want [junior guard Curtis] Jerrells to get going with shooting the basketball," coach Frank Martin said. "We did a pretty good job of that in the first half. Give him credit. He came out in the second half and he brought the fight to the fight. He was aggressive and made some hard shots over Michael Beasley."

Baylor (18-8, 6-6 Big 12) played it close in the second half, eventually taking the lead for good at the 9:34 mark on a jumper by Jerrells. K-State pulled within two at the 1:50 mark, after Beasley sank two free throws.

The significant statistic of the second half occurred when Baylor had 13 points off of turnovers to K-State's zero. The Bears also got 11 points off the bench to K-State's

K-State wins 6 events at Ahearn's KSU open

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track and field team gained valuable experience and preparation for next weekend's Big 12 Conference Championship Saturday at the KSU Open.

The Wildcats also took six titles along the way.

Track and field coach Cliff Rovelto said the open was a good warm-up for the conference meet in Lincoln, Neb. He said it showed him the team is getting closer to being ready for next weekend's competition.

"For the most part, based on what I observed, I think we moved that direction," Rovelto said. "The things we wanted or hoped to accomplish, we did."

In the first event of the meet in Ahearn Field House, the Wildcats notched a one-two-three finish in the women's weight throw. Junior Loren Groves placed first with her throw of 69-02.75, a meet record, the second best throw of her career, and her second NCAA automatic qualifying mark. Finishing just behind Groves was senior Laci Heller, who earned her fifth NCAA provisional qualifying mark with a throw of 64-03.00. Rounding out the top-three was freshman Amanda Boor. Boor set a personal best with her throw of 53-05.00.

Rovelto said he expects Groves and Heller to be able to score for the Wildcats in the conference meet.

"Obviously Laci and Loren, even on days that are sub-par, they're still throwing at a high-enough level that they are going to contribute, significantly," Rovelto said.

The Wildcats earned a one-two finish in the women's 60-meter dash, with senior Marnyka Honeycutt edging out senior teammate Donnicce Parrish. The duo finished one-two in the prelims and then again in the finals with Honeycutt clocking in at 7.58, and Parrish finishing at 7.69. Honeycutt's prelim time of 7.57 tied her career best and was her best of the season.

Wildcat pole vaulters also earned a one-two finish. Junior Nancy Harrington cleared a height of 12-00.5, and sophomore Alexandra Gonzalez cleared the bar at 11-06.5 to take second.

Junior Mike Myer secured a victory for the Wildcats when he finished the men's 60-meter dash with a second-best career time of 6.82.

With many athletes resting for next weekend, the Wildcats only had five athletes compete in races longer than 400-meters. Of these competitors, two earned event victories for the Wildcats.

Matt Castro | COLLEGIAN

Senior pole vaulter Bryce Bergman practices jumps Saturday afternoon during the KSU Open at Ahearn Field House.

Junior Alex UMBERGER won the 1,600-meter run with a personal-best time of 4:24.37. Sophomore Danny Schneider also notched a personal best, winning the 1,000-meter run in a time of 2:28.32.

The Wildcats also had a strong performance from freshman Michael Healey in the high jump. Healey finished second, clearing 6-10.25, to teammate Lamar Garrett, who was competing unattached because he does not have indoor eligibility.

Healey said he wanted to jump higher at the open, but he felt the competition prepared him for the conference meet.

"I'm a lot more confident about making jumps on my first attempt, which is really important," Healey said. "I really want to jump 7-1.5 or 7-2.0."

Rovelto said he was impressed by junior Adam Fretwell and freshmen Rok Derzanic and Moritz Cleve, all of whom will compete in the heptathlon next week. Cleve and Derzanic both ran personal bests in the 60-meter hurdles, finishing at 8.11 and 8.27, respectively.

"Those three guys in the heptathlon, we need for them to do well, and it looks like they are rounding into shape pretty well," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said there were several Wildcats who showed good signs going into the conference championships. Freshmen Emmanuel Neizer and Ti-Ara Walpool earned second place finishes in the men's long jump and the women's triple jump, respectively.

"Emmanuel Neizer had a couple of jumps that were fouls that were definitely in the range of being able to score," Rovelto said.

Women lose Big 12 lead

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOULDER, Colo. — Freshman forward Brittany Spears finished with 20 points and senior forward Jackie McFarland scored 17 of her 19 points in the second half, leading Colorado's women's basketball team to a 73-68 victory over No. 15 K-State on Saturday night in Boulder, Colo.

The Wildcats (18-8, 10-3 Big 12) have lost two in a row and had their seven-game road winning streak halted. K-State also tumbled out of a tie with Baylor for the conference lead.

Colorado sophomore guard Bianca Smith hit a three-pointer with just under a minute remaining to give the Buffaloes a 69-66 lead.

After junior guard Shalee Lehning glided in for a layup with 44 seconds remaining, the Buffaloes worked the shot clock down and Whitney Houston launched a three-pointer that bounced off the back of the rim.

However, McFarland grabbed the rebound, went back up and was fouled as she made the shot. She completed a three-point play with 16.1 seconds to play to seal Colorado's second straight win.

The Buffaloes (15-11, 4-9) had dropped nine of their last 11 before the win over the Wildcats. It was Colorado's third victory over a ranked team this season.

Smith finished with 17 points and five three-pointers, including one with under a minute left to give the Buffaloes. McFarland also had six assists and sophomore forward Aija Putnina grabbed eight rebounds.

Lehning had 19 points to lead Kansas State. Senior guard Kimberly Dietz, who's from Boulder, added 16 points, including four three-pointers and Ashley Sweat had 15.

Junior forward Marlies Gipson, the Wildcats' second-leading scorer, fouled out with 5:49 remaining. She scored all six of her points in the first half.

Baseball off to a rough start with 2 losses on West Coast

By Mike DeVader
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State didn't get its baseball season off to a good start with weekend losses to California, 5-1, and Santa Clara, 9-2.

The Wildcats played two games after both doubleheader games against Santa Clara on Saturday, and California on Sunday, were canceled because of inclement weather. The Wildcats' season opener started off with a leadoff home run by junior right fielder Jordan Cruz to right field off of Golden Bears junior pitcher Tyson Ross. Cruz's blast was the first leadoff homer by a Wildcat in nearly four years when Terry Blunt opened a game against Oklahoma State with a homer on April, 23, 2004.

Cal came back in the bottom of the first inning with a pair of runs, but also got single runs in the third and fourth innings to put the game out of reach. The Golden Bears final run came in the seventh off K-State junior reliever Lance Hoge, as sophomore third baseman Jeff Kobornus homered to left. Wildcat senior pitcher

Brad Hutt was tagged with the loss, giving up three earned runs in six innings.

Cal's Ross wasn't flustered by giving up the lead-off home run, coming back to get the win and striking out seven K-State batters in five innings.

K-State was able to get only one hit off of Ross, but when Cal reliever Daniel Wolford came in for the last four innings, the Wildcats' luck didn't change as they couldn't touch him, going without a single hit for the rest of the game. Wolford also fanned five more Wildcat hitters.

The Wildcats' bats were more alive against Santa Clara than against Cal, but a seven-run fourth inning by Santa Clara was upsetting for K-State.

The game started off smoothly for Wildcat senior starting pitcher Chase Bayuk as he got inning-ending double plays in the first two innings, but he got tagged for a pair of runs in the third.

K-State was unable to answer in the top of the fourth, and then the flood gates opened on the Wildcats.

The Broncos tallied five extra base hits and crossed the plate seven times in their half of the fourth. Santa Clara's scoring burst consisted of three doubles and a three-run homer off junior reliever Todd Vogel.

K-State got on the board in the fifth inning as sophomore catcher Daniel Delasega got a base hit to left to score junior infielder Nate Tenbrink.

Tenbrink then added another run as he hit a solo homer to right field in the ninth inning. The Wildcats were unable to build any momentum as they were shut down the rest of the inning.

The Cats' next play action will be in the Cardinal Classic in Beaumont, Texas. They will play Feb. 28 to March 2.

K-State opponents will be Arkansas State, Michigan State, Lamar and Michigan State again on the last day of the Classic.

EQUESTRIAN

Equestrian team drops Baylor weekend shows

By Jonathan Wright
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite a strong showing by the Western squad, the K-State equestrian team came up short Friday at Baylor, making it the team's third-straight loss this season. The Bears edged out the Wildcats 10-8 on the first of back-to-back road shows.

The Western squad beat the Bears 5-3 and swept the MVP awards. Freshman Alecia Zimbelman and sophomore Courtney Watters both took home their first MVP awards.

Zimbelman won an MVP in Reigning while Watters won an MVP in Horsemanship. Junior Leslie Yates won an MVP in Equitation on the Flat.

The competition also included several exhibition matches. Sophomore Kaylee Stout won an MVP award in Reigning, while sophomore Mikaela Sundgren won an MVP award in Horsemanship.

The K-State equestrian team continued its road trip the next day at Texas A&M where it dropped another show.

The Wildcats lost to the Aggies 14-8, making it the fourth-straight loss on the season and third-straight this spring.

Junior Tara Hallan captured her first varsity win by beating Texas A&M freshman Randi Standley in Reigning. Junior Katie Mellon also won her first competition this season as she defeated Texas A&M junior Christina Heine in Equitation on the Flat.

The loss marked the second time that K-State lost to Texas A&M this season. The Aggies came to K-State and defeated the Wildcats 12-8 during the fall.

BAYLOR | Wildcats led Bears in rebounds

three.

"I don't want, in any way, to take anything away from Baylor," Martin said. "They've had a heck of a year. They've come off a stretch of playing some hard, hard games and losing some heartbreakers. They came out today and protected their home court. That's what good players do."

Besides Walker and Beasley, freshman forward Ron Anderson had five points for the Wildcats and senior guard Blake Young had four. The Wildcats out-rebounded Baylor, 42-34, with 24 of those rebounds coming from Beasley and Walker. The Wildcats only shot 37 percent from the floor in the second half, after a 56-percent first half.

Scoring big for Baylor was Jerrells, who had 24 points, junior forward Kevin Rogers, who had 18 and sophomore guard Tweety Carter, who had 12. Dunn also had 16 points for the Bears. Baylor's leading rebounder was Rogers, who had 10 boards. The Bears shot 58 percent from the floor in the second half, including six of 10 from beyond the arc.

"Our last two road losses, I haven't been very happy," Martin said. "I'd like to think that the average person who pays attention to this conference and doesn't rush to judge a single team understands how difficult it is to win on the road in this conference. There's not another league in the country that is so good, top to bottom."

The Wildcats will face off against Texas at 8 to-night in a Big Monday showdown. The game will be broadcasted on ESPN. Walker said the team has acknowledged the bad stretch of road games.

WOMEN'S TENNIS

K-State loses matches to Utah, BYU over weekend, with only two singles wins

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In two matches in Utah over the weekend, the K-State women's tennis team was defeated 6-1 by Utah and 6-1 by BYU.

On Friday, the Wildcats started their weekend venture to the Beehive State against Utah at Eccles Tennis Center in Salt Lake City. The only K-State player to win a match was Olga Klimova, who defeated Karine Bourdages 6-2, 2-6 (10-8) in a singles match.

All three K-State doubles teams and five other players in singles matches were defeated.

The trip continued Saturday where the Wildcats played against BYU in Provo, Utah.

The lone winner for the Wildcats in singles was Antea Huljev. Huljev defeated Chje Hayasaka 6-2, 1-6, 6-2.

K-State's three doubles teams were soundly defeated in three separate matches 8-2, 8-1, 8-2.

Five other K-State singles players lost in their matches.

The Wildcats will return to action March 5 when they face KU 2 p.m. at K-State.

Thrift-store items cheap, stylish

Thrift shops, second-hand stores, pawn shops. They all have different names, but essentially the same items when it comes to clothing — cheap, used threads that are usually from the 1980s. I will admit, the only aspect the majority of these items are good for is tacky-themed parties. But if you really dig deep enough in these shops and patiently flip through rack after rack of polyester jackets and oversized sweaters, you can almost always find something cute and wearable.

I visited three second-hand stores in Manhattan — The Salvation Army, Grand Ol' Trunk and My Friend's Closet — in search of a few old items I could make look new again. I was a bit apprehensive at first, but was pleasantly surprised by the shopping outcome. I was able to put together an outfit for every occasion — evening, business, business casual and casual — using what I found in the second-hand stores and pieces I already owned. It takes a little more time than strolling through the mall, but on our college budgets, who couldn't afford digging a little to spend $15 on seven items instead of just one?

If Grand 'Ol Trunk is already your favorite store, keep up the hunting. If you've never stepped foot inside a thrift shop, give it a try. I think you'll be pleasantly surprised with what you find. Most of the items will be basics and need to be paired with more exciting pieces, but every once in a while, you will find something truly different. But just a friendly reminder — thoroughly wash and clean everything before you wear it.

ELISE
PODHAIJSKY

1) Found on a rack next to denim tube tops, this sweater dress was originally from Target — before it made its way to My Friend's Closet. This is my favorite find of all the pieces, because you could literally walk into Target and buy it right now. But instead of paying $17.99, I only paid a fraction of its cost.

2) Basics like tank tops are one of the easiest things to find in second-hand stores. Though most of them should not be worn on their own, they work just fine for coverage under thin shirts or low-cut tops; and they're always super cheap.

3) Belts are still very popular in the fashion industry, but instead of the thick, wide belts that were in a few years ago, style has down-sized. This is great for thrift-shoppers because each store I visited had tons of used belts — some more used than others. But the majority were skinny to one-inch — perfect for any outfit today.

4) Lucky for us, high-waisted skirts and pants are in demand once again, and they are in thrift shops by the dozens. The trick, however, is finding one that doesn't date itself by length, pattern or pleating. What made this skirt great was the simple color, design and pockets — pockets are very trendy on skirts right now. This skirt could also easily be shortened for a younger look.

5-6) Jewelry is my favorite part about second-hand shops. I love vintage earrings and necklaces, and there are always many one-of-a-kind accessories to be found in these stores. When I saw this set, I knew I had to have them; pearls are a timeless classic that make any outfit more sophisticated.

7) As I said earlier, basics are the easiest to find in thrift stores. Many people probably walked right past this sweater, seeing it only as a boring orange turtleneck. But paired with the right pieces, this boring sweater becomes a colorful necessity.

8) Something else I love about second-hand-shop jewelry is its versatility. If you're creative enough, you can take pins and brooches and turn them into necklaces or earrings. This case was a little more simple than that, but equally as fun. This chunky, dangle necklace is actually some hideous belt from who-knows-when. But when worn as a necklace, it becomes very cute and trendy.

9) I love these shoes. The pointed toe is something that has been in style for a while now, but the open cut is what's hot with designers right now. Typically, I've seen this cut on ankle boots, but rarely on a pump. Watch shoe stores over the next few months. I can almost guarantee you'll start to see heels like these.

10) Again with the basics. Cute button-downs are fairly simple to find in these stores and can go with almost any outfit. A solid cardigan is an essential to any woman's wardrobe, and it fits even better when you pay less than $3 for it.

11) Ah, the vintage T-shirt; one of the most fun items to look for in a second-hand store. It seems to be in a surplus in most shops. Its look of faded, thinned cotton is something many designers charge big bucks for — Standard Style, a designer store in Kansas City, Mo., and Leawood, Kan., sells faded and thinned KU T-shirts for $90, but who would want that in the first place? — but you only have to spend a couple dollars at most if you go to a thrift store.

- 1) Sweater dress - My Friend's Closet, $5.
- 2) Tank top - Grand Ol' Trunk, $1.25.
- 3) Belt - My Friend's Closet, $2.
- 4) Skirt - Salvation Army, $2.49.
- 5) Pearl necklace - Salvation Army, $1.29.
- 6) Pearl bracelet - Salvation Army, $.89.
- 7) Turtleneck - Salvation Army, $2.49.
- 8) Chain necklace - Grand Ol' Trunk, $3.
- 9) Shoes - Grand Ol' Trunk, $3.
- 10) Sweater - Salvation Army, $2.49.
- 11) T-shirt - My Friend's Closet - $2

SEX AND THE CITY: THE LITTLE APPLE

Sex secrets can be damaging, yet add touch of mystery to relationship

Shhh ... keep quiet. I've got a secret ... a sex secret that might even make the furry handcuff-ready Jenna Jameson blush.

But before I air the dirty laundry of relationships past, I wonder just how many in the Little Apple have secrets too — and of course, what kind of secrets you're holding back.

When it comes to successful relationships, people supposedly open up. They reach a point of comfort at which their partner receives an all-access pass to their history: personal, sexual, what have you. But somewhere between the hand-holding and late-night pillow talks is hesitancy, a point at which one partner considers withholding his or her lustier past... but does it pay off?

In a recent relationship, I became involved with classic bad boy: a slightly under-achieving, drunken womanizer, who somehow scrapped up enough charm to catch my attention — and of some underage, short-skirted types. He was unbelievably cute, but equipped with barrels of cynicism, I wasn't taken too easily. We talked. By the wee hours of the night at his wall-to-wall party, I finally let off my guard — hell, I was impressed he tolerated my long-winded banter that long.

We hit it off. By the end of the night, I bid him some farewell smooches, headed home and waited. It didn't take long before this bad boy invited me back for additional nights of cocktails and cock-and-bull stories. We laughed more, talked more and kissed more. Yet over time, the heat in this good-girl, bad-boy romance lost its sizzle as the rumors — and what turned out to be tiny little secrets — surfaced.

Turned out my bad boy had an even worse habit of seducing barely legal women with booze and broken promises — kind of like the tale of the bad man who lured children with candy when you were little. Though this story wasn't completely shocking, the moment I learned of things like sex tapes and other whips-and-chains stories, I began to back out. I confronted him about the stories, which he confirmed were true. Yet, I felt like a fool. I didn't truly know the man whom I began to fall for, and I knew retracting from his hooks would probably be my safest escape from his sex secrets.

Sex is power, but when sex is a secret, it can be an unearthly, hidden power that can overwhelm the species. In the case of this sexually explorative bad boy, he is not alone. A 2007 Journal of Sex Research study shows 80 percent of women and 98 percent of men have frequent fantasies about people other than their partner, and the gender gap narrows with longer-term relationships. About 37 percent of these men and 24 percent of these women bring these fantasies to reality — but of these people, many probably weren't honest with themselves or even their partners.

Secrets in a relationship can be great. After all, none of us truly need to hear the mind-numbing details of our partner's ex's dirty habits. But, there is a line to be drawn — a common courtesy rule you should factor into your relationships: if the secret can substantially change someone's interest in you, you should front the facts. If the secret is just a trivial detail — like the fact you like to hum to the theme song of "Rocky" in the morning — you can get away with those details for a while.

Everyone has a dirty little secret, but it's how we keep those secrets that can strangle relationships. Though it's important to keep relationships honest, it's OK to keep a little mystery beyond the bedroom. In fact, the mystery can be quite healthy — giving a little sexual excitement in honor of the details we don't know. Keep your secrets. Just make sure you keep them from hurting the ones you love.

Bramlage proves intimidating to opposing squads

K-State vs. KU game proved memorable experience for fans, outsiders, players

By Jonathan Wright
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Before the buzzer could finish sounding, a sea of purple charged over the railings onto the court. The media personnel tried their best to avoid the rush, but the students went over them, sending notebooks and laptops flying off the tables onto the floor. A purple mass swarmed center court as fans exalted in the first Wildcat victory over rival KU at home in 25 years. The fan's response was a welcoming sight for senior guard Clint Stewart.

"It's all appreciative," Stewart said. "The fans appreciate what we've given them and we appreciate what they've given us by coming out and supporting us. It's a two-way street. We're giving back to them just like they are coming out and supporting us."

Several K-State fans, players and outsiders alike were in Bramlage Coliseum Jan. 30 said they will remember it. Here are three stories of the memories from that day.

THE K-STATE FAN

It was 4:30 a.m., and while most college students still slept, hundreds of K-State students on Jan. 30 got an early start to their day, including Kris Hawley, junior in agribusiness.

"Today's the day, man," Hawley said.

He put on several layers of clothes. When he walked outside, he noted the strong north wind. He turned back and grabbed some extra blankets.

On his way to Bramlage Coliseum, he said he couldn't think about anything except the game. Kansas was coming to Manhattan to play the Wildcats. With freshman forward Michael Beasley's famous guarantee, the stage was set for an extraordinary evening. When he arrived, he was surprised to see people already in line.

"There were people there who said they slept in the bushes [to avoid police] overnight so they could be first in line," Hawley said.

Hawley took his rightful place in line and bundled up. The wind snuck in through the folds in the blanket, which he said kept him awake.

"It was cold, and did I mention it was cold? Oh yeah, it was really cold, too," Hawley said.

As the minutes turn into hours, more fans showed up. By 10 a.m., several hundred people were in line. Some of Hawley's friends showed up around noon. They woke him and kept him company as the day wore on.

As students showed up, the line grew. Television crews arrived and filmed students in line. They had waited hours to see their team play.

THE OUTSIDER

His plane arrived on time at Kansas City International Airport. After a brief stroll down to baggage claim, Sports Illustrated writer Luke Winn walked over to get his rental car. As he turned on the ignition and began the long trek down I-70, he began thinking about his article.

He had never been to Manhattan, Kan. All he knew was Sports Illustrated assigned him to do an in-depth article on KU's senior forward, Darnell Jackson, in the next issue of its magazine.

Winn finally arrived in Manhattan. As he made his way down Kimball Avenue and toward Bramlage Coliseum, he saw something off in the distance. He said there seemed to be a blurry purple line extending from the Coliseum all the way out to Kimball Avenue.

It was the students. He said he had seen it time and again, so it was nothing new to him. As he got out of his car and shut the door, the wind hit him. Now he said he understood the true dedication of the Wildcat fans.

"I've seen tent villages at plenty of schools," Winn said. "But the fact that K-State students waited outside in that weather - and even hid out in bushes - showed some real fortitude. I was freezing just walking from my rental car to the media gate. There's no way I could have lasted out there from 5 a.m. until game time."

Winn walked down to the media gate and into the arena. Soon, the crowd was allowed in and students sprinted down the rows of the arena to get a prime seat for the game.

It was almost time to start the game. The players were back into the locker room and would soon be coming out to go through final warm-ups. Out of nowhere, something unique catches Winn's attention.

THE PLAYER

He said he retied his shoelaces one last time in the locker room. Coach Frank Martin gave his players some final inspirational words. As they exited the locker room, the video camera sat at the end of the hallway, and off in the distance, senior guard Clint Stewart heard them. He said his heart began to pound harder and harder until he could hardly concentrate.

Stewart is in his senior year as a Wildcat and has been through countless games at Bramlage Coliseum. For some reason, he said he continues to get the same feeling in the pit of his stomach every time.

In front of him, senior guard Blake Young cupped his hand to his ear, imploring the crowd to get louder. One thought went through Stewart's head:

"Let's get it," Stewart said. "I came here to play basketball in front of 13,000 people, so [I'm thinking] let's get it."

As the team made its way into the tunnel, the crowd was near a deafening volume. The team huddled up right before running onto the court. Stewart delivered one message to his teammates:

"It's time to shine," Stewart said to his teammates.

The huddle broke. A thunderous roar erupted from the crowd as the team made its way onto the court. The band played the fight song, and 13,000 purple fans sang along in one voice.

Then, the band changed its tune, playing the "Wabash Cannonball." Thousands of screaming students moved back and forth to the music. Up and down they went in a tradition that still gets to Stewart, he said.

"Sometimes, I'm on the court and I'm kind of doing it myself," Stewart said. "It's a lot of fun seeing them do the Wabash."

The one-minute buzzer sounded, and the players went over to their benches. As he sat down, Stewart went through his last-minute preparations. The opposing team was about to be introduced. As he glanced across the court again, his eyes grew wide.

Less than 100 feet from him were thousands of newspapers. The students had all sat down and held up newspapers, as if to say that the other team wasn't worth their time.

After the opposing team was finished, Stewart said he glanced back across the court. The newspapers were gone.

The students leapt to their feet and tossed thousands of newspaper bits into the air in jubilation. For a moment, Stewart said he was lost in a trance. An assuring thought briefly ran through his head when he saw the newspaper bits float softly back down to the ground.

"You don't see that at other places," Stewart said. "When opposing teams come here, they are probably surprised to see that."

Next, it was game time. Stewart said he was focused.

The added noise gave him an adrenaline rush. Each time the Wildcats scored, he heard the crowd cheer and holler. It got so loud sometimes that he couldn't hear himself think.

"I definitely do notice [the crowd] during the game," Stewart said. "Especially at times when we make a big run and the other coach has to call a timeout. Like during the KU game, you couldn't hear on the court."

During difficult stretches, it seemed as if the crowd was almost willing the Wildcats through the rough patches. As the game neared its end, Winn couldn't believe what he was witnessing. The Wildcats were on the verge of pulling off a miracle upset.

With 40 seconds left, freshman forward Bill Walker received a long pass on a breakaway. Walker dunked the ball through the rim. The crowd erupted in complete madness. K-State was merely seconds away from ending the streak.

"The students really brought it for that KU game," said Luke Winn. "It was deafening at times. I was thinking about it afterward, and I hadn't heard a home crowd like that since being at Illinois during their great 2004-05 season. Assembly Hall, like Bramlage, isn't a beautiful place, but they're both capable of getting crazy-loud."

On the court, Kris Hawley was among thousands of screaming fans. He, along with everyone else, was jumping up and down at center court, holding up a finger, signifying K-State's first place standing in the Big 12 Conference.

WHAT KANSAS COACH BILL SELF HAD TO SAY ABOUT BRAMLAGE COLISEUM JAN. 30

"We will not play in an environment like this again this year. This was fabulous. There will be some other good ones we go to, but this was fabulous. I couldn't even hear the whistle blow. Our guards didn't communicate as well as possible to get everybody on the same page. We can't blame that."

"The feeling was indescribable," Hawley said.

The path back to the locker room for Stewart was long and tiresome. He had just played basketball for nearly two hours against some of the best athletes in the country. As he sat in front of his locker exhausted, he couldn't help but think about how important the fans at K-State are and how special he feels to play in front of them. One word comes to his mind when thinking about K-State.

"Tremendous," Stewart said with a smile.

Waiting outside for 12 hours in the cold was worth it, Hawley said.

"You know," Hawley said. "It was cold. It was miserable. It was a long wait. But I'd do it again in a heartbeat."

Looking ahead

Lack of recruits shouldn't affect K-State

Last April, thanks to the recruiting genius of coach Frank Martin and assistant Dalonte Hill, the K-State men's basketball team brought in not only the best recruiting class the school had ever seen, but arguably the best Class of 2007 in the entire nation.

Headlined by two five-star recruits named Michael Beasley and Bill Walker, the Wildcats' eight-man recruiting class was ranked No. 1 in college basketball by Rivals.com. Many of these players have made significant contributions to the team's success this season, which proves Martin, Hill and the rest of the K-State coaching staff know how to go out and find talent.

However, after coming off the best recruiting year in K-State history, it appears the situation will be much different for the Wildcats this season.

Signing day, which will take place April 16, is fast approaching, and the Wildcats currently have a grand total of zero commitments for the 2008-09 season. Though this might initially come as a shock, there's no cause for alarm.

With one red-shirt freshman, six true freshmen (including one who is currently red-shirted) and a junior transfer on the current roster, it appears the coaches are in no hurry to schedule any recruiting trips in the near future. Let's take a look at what the future has in store for each position.

GUARDS

I'm not saying K-State (18-7, 8-3 Big 12 Conference) won't have any gaps to fill next season. What I'm saying is they already have all the tools they need to fill those gaps, so recruiting isn't necessary right now.

For instance, the Wildcats will lose depth at guard with the departure of seniors Blake Young, who has started all 25 games this season, and Clint Stewart, who has seen action in 22 contests, including 14 starts.

However, freshman Jacob Pullen, who has played in all 25 games with 13 starts, is constantly improving and gaining confidence as a starter, and junior Denis Clemente, who transferred to K-State from the University of Miami after last season, will be eligible to play next season, so the Wildcats have two perfectly capable replacements. Problem solved.

FORWARDS

It appears the Wildcats would even be able to rebound if freshmen Michael Beasley or Bill Walker decide to leave K-State for the NBA after this season (let's hope that doesn't happen, but it's definitely a possibility). Junior Darren Kent, who has played in all but one game this season, and freshman Ron Anderson, who has seen time in 22 games, including six starts, have both shown that they can make their presence felt in the middle.

Junior Andre Gilbert, who has averaged 19.1 minutes in 19 contests for the Wildcats, has shown the ability to score from anywhere on the floor (see his 22-point performance against Rider on Nov. 25, 2007).

Freshman Dominique Sutton, a late-arrival who has seen action in 11 games with four starts, has shown flashes of brilliance and explosive athletic ability, and freshman Jamar Samuels, who joined the squad with Sutton on Dec. 26, 2007, but opted to red-shirt for the rest of the season, will look to compete for playing time as well.

Also, let's not rule out the possibility of senior David Hoskins being granted one more year of eligibility. The NCAA won't tell K-State whether Hoskins is receiving a medical redshirt until after the conclusion of the season, so keep your fingers crossed.

'NEW' ADDITIONS

If you think about it, you could look at Samuels and Clemente as an impromptu 2008 recruiting class. Neither player has seen any action in a Wildcat uniform yet, but both already have a significant amount of experience. This is a big advantage because they won't have to wait until next season to learn how things work like high-school recruits would.

Because Hoskins would be returning from his injury after having a season off, he falls in this category as well. He has an even bigger advantage because he's played two seasons in K-State's system under former coaches Jim Wooldridge and Bob Huggins.

Honestly, how many schools can say their recruiting class has a freshman with previous experience in their team's system, as well as two players that already have experience playing at the college level? My guess is K-State would be the only school that could make that claim.

When signing day arrives in April, don't plan on hearing K-State's name being tossed around nearly as much as it was last year. In 2007, Martin and his staff proved that they can bring some of the best talent in the country to Manhattan, and they can bring it in large numbers. They executed this strategy so well last year that they can afford to stay away from the recruiting trail for a while.

It appears K-State is finally starting to reap the benefits of having such a talented group of players, and it's highly unlikely that most of them would go anywhere, so there's no need to panic, K-State fans.

Recruiting class or not, the Wildcats will be ready to roll next season.

Now back from injury, Gipson helps Wildcats to No. 1 spot in Big 12 play

By Joel Aschbrenner
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When junior forward Marlies Gipson dislocated her knee during a team practice last January, the Wildcats were only able to win five of their last 18 games.

"It was real tough watching my team struggle," Gipson said. "It was hard, but my teammates were definitely there for me. It's always hard sitting out and watching games. Just remaining positive was something I had to concentrate on."

The team had started the season with a 14-2 record, but finished at just 19-15, with Gipson sidelined. This season, with Gipson back in the line-up, the women's basketball team is 18-7 and tied for the lead in the Big 12 Conference.

If the Wildcats' struggles without Gipson last season didn't prove how valuable she is to the team, current stats suggest otherwise. With her, the Wildcats are 10-2 in the Big 12, and are ranked No. 15 in the country. She is the Wildcats' No. 2 leading scorer, notching 12 points per game, and is grabbing a team-high 8.2 rebounds per game.

The Wildcats were originally picked to finish eighth in the conference and are now atop the League standings. Coach Deb Patterson said this is a testament to how valuable Gipson has been to this season.

"I think she is that big of an impact player in our program," Patterson said. "When she brings intensity and when she brings confidence to the floor, we're a different basketball team."

Patterson compared Gipson to a quarterback on offense and a middle linebacker when the Wildcats are on the defensive side of the floor.

"Whether it's offense or defense, Marlies makes it go," Patterson said. "She's the brains of the operation. She anticipates, and she makes big plays, or helps set up big plays."

Sophomore forward Ashley Sweat said Gipson's ability shoot outside and her versatility inside add another element to the team's attack.

"On the defensive end she brings a lot too," Sweat said. "She has great timing on shot blocks. She's a great rebounder. Having her back obviously brings another dimension to our team."

Sweat, who was a teammate of Gipson's at McPherson

High School, said it was tough watching Gipson sit out after playing with her for so long.

After enduring rehab this last summer, Gipson said she felt like she was all they way back to full strength by mid-September. She said she is now playing at 100 percent.

"It hasn't affected me at all," Gipson said. "I don't think about it, because I feel like if I think about it, I will start hesitating or second guessing myself."

Sweat said she sometimes has to remind herself that Gipson is coming off an injury because she is playing at such a high level.

"An injury like that is so hard to come back from," Sweat said. "I think that is a testament to the type of person she is, to come back from something like that, and to be such a strong player."

Her injury gave some younger players a chance to step up and gain experience, and even helped the Wildcats grow as a team, Gipson said, but she is glad to be on the court this season.

"I'm just happy to be back in the lineup," Gipson said. "Every game I get to play I am definitely thankful for."

Jonathan Knight | COLLEGIAN

Junior forward Gipson missed the second half of last season after dislocating her knee. Upon returning to the Wildcats this semester, she has been contributing 12 points and a team-high eight rebounds per game.

Marlies Gipson attempts to pass the ball to one of her teammates over Oklahoma's Courtney Paris. Gipson has been averaging more than one assist per game.

Columnist serves as Wildcat Press Secretary, explains losses

Whether you are an amateur or a professional politician, having the ability to address the public in any circumstance is an extremely valued trait. However, politicians do not always encounter crowds that are entirely receiving, and it becomes necessary to spin a negative topic into a positive one.

KELLY WILLIAMS

After three disappointing road losses this month, the K-State men's basketball team is being subjected to much debate over whether or not they can really get the job done. So, in light of the upcoming Student Government Association elections and all the political hoopla surrounding our country today, I am enacting myself as the official Wildcat press secretary. My job is simple — just spin the negatives from the three recent losses into some key positives in regards to the future of this Wildcat team.

"Press Secretary Williams, please explain the recent let down at Missouri. Just three days after the biggest win in the program's last 25 years, the Wildcats fall to a lesser ## rival. What happened?"

Thank you for the question. I'm glad you asked; this is something we've wanted to address.

You might have witnessed while watching the game, and as coach Frank Martin also noted in the post-game conference, that the team played a great first half, but accompanied it with a lackluster second half.

That being said, it inevitably led to a Tiger win. We felt the team learned a valuable lesson from this game: Once you have the opponent on the mat, you cannot let him get back up.

It is unfortunate that the lesson learned at Missouri resulted in a loss, but we did come back as a team to win two in a row against Nebraska and Oklahoma State. I might also add that those wins ended with a large margin of victory, proving that the effort and drive were still evident. Next question, please.

"Yes, over here Mr. Williams. The Missouri loss might be vindicated in your explanation, but please detail what happened at Texas Tech. Yet another inexcusable loss to a bottom feeder in the Big 12, correct?"

To some degree your comment is true. One could assume a team stocked with so much talent, accompanied with veteran leadership at the perimeter, would learn their lesson from a bad loss at Missouri and capture a much-needed victory at Tech. That is an understandable assumption from anyone, but you have to take into account that this is an extremely young team from top to bottom. Young teams equal roller-coaster rides, and we all know that they go up and down, and up and down.

To further detail the loss, Texas Tech had one of their best offensive outings of the year against our Wildcats, with one of their players going for at least 16 points above his season average. Freshman forward Bill Walker did his best to help the Wildcats battle this offensive outburst from the Red Raiders by having one of his best shooting performances of the season, but was not enough to seal the victory.

Also, frustration was abundant on the court that night, especially from freshman forward Michael Beasley and senior guard Blake Young, who both received technical fouls. The two spearheaded a comeback from a 22-point deficit to come within four — overcoming their frustrations. Having a team that doesn't quit no matter what the situation, is fantastic.

Again, it is disappointing that the Wildcats didn't sneak out a win that night, but much learning and growing occurred on "Pat Knight Day," in Lubbock, Texas.

"Okay Mr. Williams, nice job outlining those first two conference road losses for us, but how does one explain the loss to Nebraska? They are a team that had lost to Colorado, Iowa State and most recently were defeated by a reeling Missouri squad at home. Please, clarify for us why we should accept such a performance?"

You pose a valid question and this loss is not easy to justify, but it is understandable when looking at the big picture. Expectations have been set high for this team throughout the year. They were high before the season, high after Thanksgiving and even higher after the win over KU. I think to some degree an exaggerated level of expectation has hurt this team in the eyes of the public, which makes a road loss to Nebraska call for many to hit the panic button.

What I would like to reiterate over and over is that this team is young — very young at that. We are not only witnessing 18 and 19 year old young men grow up on the court right before our eyes, but also watching a rookie head coach do the same. Progress is being made night in and night out, but I would have to agree that the Nebraska loss was bad. It may actually be the first "true" let-down since the conference season started.

I feel that the loss will not be accepted by the players or coaches of K-State, and that you as a fan should not accept it either. It was the compound of a lack of emotion, pride and focus, and it looks like the Wildcats finally got a genuinely bad loss out of their system. Also, take notice that these losses have all been to inferior opponents. It will be interesting to see how the Wildcats respond on the road in games against teams such as Kansas.

In closing, I feel that the K-State Wildcat men's basketball team is doing a fine job so far this season and progress is being made every night, even if that progress is discovered from analyzing a negative. Young teams take a while to develop, and we might have been spoiled earlier this year when the Wildcats started off on fire. Look for our Wildcats to rediscover their stride this week in games against Texas and Kansas — two great tests to see how far this team might go.

Thanks again for all of the questions, ladies and gentlemen; it has been a pleasure addressing them. I will now leave you with one final comment, and that is no matter what the situation it's always a great day to be a Wildcat. There's no spinning necessary for that statement because it's always a positive. This "Wildcat Presser," is officially over, and thank you for your participation.

K-State running back allegedly stabbed

By Allison Voris
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State football player was stabbed and two other people were injured during a confrontation in the early morning hours Sunday, according to Riley County Police Department reports.

JOHNSON

RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said senior running back James Johnson allegedly was stabbed five times by Aaron Wallace, 26, of Kansas City, Kan., during a confrontation that began at a bar and continued at an after-party at 1752 Cassell Road. After the stabbing, a group of people at the house allegedly beat Wallace until he was unconscious, according to RCPD reports.

Resident of the house, Christopher Patterson, 22, also was injured during the incident. He was cut on the hand while trying to break up the fight.

Johnson and Wallace both were treated at Mercy Regional Health Center for their injuries, according to RCPD reports. Johnson was treated for stab wounds to his right side, the center of his lower back and to his right forearm as well as for two wounds under his left arm.

Moldrup said the incident is still under investigation, and no arrests have been made.

"The ninjas realized they could not win in a political arena, so they resorted back to their 'hiding in the shadows' and 'cloak and dagger,'" Schurr said. "They may have stepped up and stepped back to make people think they went away, but they're still there. They're being sneaky just like they always have been."

The Riley County Police Department has received a grant to help prevent underage drinking from the Kansas Department of Transportation's Bureau of Traffic Safety for the fourth year in a row.

KDOT program consultant Robert Eichkorn said the grant is for $9,330.16.

"The Office of Juvenile Justice provides every state with a pot of money for enforcing the underage drinking laws," he said. "We receive this money from Washington every year, and we try to distribute it throughout the state to local agencies to help combat the underage drinking problem, which is prevalent especially in college towns."

Eichkorn said the RCPD will use the money to help pay for officers' overtime while they are patrolling for underage drinking. He said they will be looking for house parties, underage purchasing of alcohol and checking bars in search of youths in possession or consumption of alcohol.

According to a RCPD press release, officers will patrol residential areas during weekend evenings, based on past complaints of underage drinking by the public. The release also stated police will perform bar checks in Aggieville as well as the city's outerlying areas.

RCPD Lt. Steve Boyda said the grant will be effective March 1 through May 31. He said the coverage and number of officers on patrol will be the same as last year, but officers will try at least one different prevention technique. However, Boyda said he preferred to keep the new technique confidential.

Police also will focus on a statute that was implemented in July regarding minors at parties and the parties' hosts. Boyda said the statute makes party hosts responsible if minors are drinking, whereas before it was hard to hold them accountable.

"We notice that a lot of underage drinking leads to DUIs, batteries and people perhaps not making the best decisions while under the influence," he said. "The goal is to educate and make minors aware that there are consequences for their actions if they choose to consume alcohol. We prefer that they didn't, but the ones that do, we prefer they do it in a reasonable manner."

KANSAS STATUTES REGARDING UNDERAGE DRINKING:

- (note: these do not include county or city laws/ordinances)
- Furnishing alcohol to a minor (K.S.A. 21-3610)
- Indirect selling to a minor (K.S.A. 14-13-13(o))
- Permitting consumption or possession on the licensed premise by a minor (K.S.A. 41-2615)
- Possession of altered or fictitious driver's license (K.S.A. 8-260)
- Possession of altered or fictitious non-driver's license (K.S.A. 8-1327)
- Purchase or consumption of alcohol by a minor (K.S.A. 41-727)
- Selling, giving, delivering or furnishing alcoholic liquor to a minor (K.S.A. 14-13-13(n))

Developing Scholars Program encourages student growth

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mychal Davis said he is shaping his college career so he can serve as a positive role model in his community.

"I feel people in my community need strong, positive male role models to push them forward in life," Davis, freshman in animal science and industry, said. "I believe that one day I can become one of these role models."

Davis expressed this desire during his speech at the Developing Scholars Program's "Target on Excellence" Colloquium Monday afternoon in the K-State Student Union.

During the Colloquium, six young scholars discussed their philosophies, attitudes and paths toward goals and dreams. While addressing these topics, the student panel kept in line with the Colloquium's theme: "This I Believe: Why my Education Matters."

Students involved in the Developing Scholars Program are not only academic achievers, but well-rounded individuals with integrity and leadership skills as well, said Anita Cortez, director of DSP. Many of them have faced challenges in their lives, but strong motivation and hard work lead them to success, she said.

Devi Bluevan, junior in psychology, also shared her story Monday at the Colloquium. She said when she was 17 years old, she joined the U.S. Navy because she thought no college would accept her because of her mediocre SAT scores. After serving in the Navy for six years, she returned to California, her home state, for one year to study the Farsi language at the Defense Language Institute Foreign Language Center in Monterey. Bluevan said she graduated at the top of her class.

"It was a turn in my life. I discovered that I'm good at something: learning languages," Bluevan said. "More importantly, it gave me confidence in everything I do."

Now, she said she enjoys serving as a DSP scholar. "I feel extremely grateful to many people - especially my mentor - who is showing me how to become a wiser person," she said.

The people involved in this program typically represent minority groups, like black, Asian American, Latino and American Indian students, but it also includes first-generation college students. These scholars have the opportunity to conduct research projects with faculty mentors and share research accomplishments with others during annual research symposiums.

Eight years ago, the program began with 20 students. Now it has tripled in size and 60 students are

City prepares for potential federal transit funds

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan could receive a boost in public-transportation development from the federal government in the next few years.

When cities record a core urban population of more than 50,000 for two straight years, they are considered a metropolitan area and are eligible to receive funding for public transit, which is determined by the U.S. Office of Management and Budget. According to www.census.gov, Manhattan recorded a population of 50,737 in 2006, and that number is expected to grow in 2007 and future years.

Though Manhattan is now over the 50,000 mark, City Commissioner Bruce Snead said he does not expect federal-transit funding until the completion of the 2010 national census.

Snead said the federal funds for public transit would be important for developing a bus system. Manhattan has had the demand for public transit for several years, he said, but has never had the funding.

Snead said a two-route fixed bus system was developed in the early 2000s to prepare for federal funding, but was shelved for later purposes. The routes would criss-cross at the university and run through highly populated areas and important commercial areas like downtown, Aggieville and K-State. Snead also said the plan included a Wildcat Shuttle that would operate on weekends, much like SafeRide, except that buses would shuttle passengers on a fixed route.

sengers on a fixed route.

He said the city would use this plan as a framework on which to build the potential transit system.

"It was a ready-to-go plan," Snead said.

"Obviously, we'd need to change some things, because there have been changes in development and growth over the past few years."

Jeff Chapman, chairman of the Social Services Advisory Board, voiced his concern about the need for public transit in Manhattan to the city commission on Feb. 12.

Chapman said several studies have shown that Manhattan and the surrounding area — including Wamego, Fort Riley and Junction City — need a stronger public transportation system. Manhattan, in particular, has problems with parking space and transportation access to different parts of the city. This access is important for care-of-life issues like transportation to child-care centers.

Chapman said there is no guarantee that Manhattan will receive federal funding for public transportation unless they can prove they have the need for a system and show a collaborative effort to sustain a system.

"What I said at the commission was, 'Look, we're two years out, and let's start working on this,'" Chapman said.

Chapman suggested that the city needs to organize a task force or organization that will study the need and possible demographics and budgeting of a transit system. He said transportation in the city is handled by a few organizations that receive funding from the city upon request to the city commission, Chapman said. Most of the transportation options are by request only or serve a certain city demographic like the Meadowlark Hills retirement community, Snead added.

Snead said he did not know when the city commission would address the issue of public transit, but he said they had at least two or three years to prepare for the system.

"It is an important issue for us to address in a timely and organized manner," Snead said.

The system would be funded by a combination of federal, state and city funding as well as by fees administered to transit users.

Sherow said a transit system would help save on fuel consumption in the community and also would solve many of the parking problems at K-State and in the community.

He said the system not only would help students with parking problems, but also would help people get around the city. He said other universities in the Big 12 Conference, like Iowa State University in Ames and the University of Texas in Austin, charge privilege fees for riding transit buses.

"How helpful would it be if students could just use their student IDs to get on a bus and go anywhere on the campus and city," Sherow said.

Commission asks for public input on South End Redevelopment

By Corene Brisendine
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Council is asking for public input on the South End Redevelopment Project during an open house starting at 5 p.m. tonight at City Hall.

The city commission room will have stations set up displaying different parts of the project.

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said the city hopes citizens will turn out to give the city commissioners ideas on how the city should develop the half-block green space within the project.

"Our concern is people don't pay attention until it's further down the road," Hatesohl said. "Then it's too late because contracts are already signed."

Hatesohl said the council has several ideas, but no definite idea of what the majority of the city wants. The council has discussed installing a platform at one end of the half-block green space, creating a lowered grass space for an ice ring during the winter months or an open air pavilion to be used as a farmer's market on weekends during the growing season.

City representatives will be at the open house to answer questions about the Discovery Center and conference center.

Dial Reality, the main developers of the entire project, will be there to answer questions on the hotel planned for the project. Once completed, Dial will run the hotel and conference center for the city.

The commission also would like input on a K-State-themed restaurant next to the hotel. Hatesohl said the restaurant would be K-State sports oriented similar to the way a Hard Rock Cafe is music orientated.

One station will have representatives from Warren Theatres to answer questions about the movie theater Warren plans on building.

Hatesohl said the entire project will take about two years. The city must first fix the water-drainage problems in the downtown area. Next, the city must determine the exact placement of the buildings. Finally, the building can begin. Hatesohl said the hotel will take about one and a half years to build.

"Just come down and look at the basic idea and let us know how [the city commission] can make [the South End Redevelopment] better," Hatesohl said.

Birth of a nation

Kosovo faces challenges after separating from Serbia

The new flag is blue, a golden outline of its territory displayed below six white stars symbolizing its main ethnic groups. The banner was chosen after an international design competition, just as its statehood was finally achieved after both international conflict and support. In fact, just about everything in Kosovo — its history, new flag, forthcoming constitution and status as the world's newest independent nation — is the result of years of multilateral involvement.

The people of Kosovo have known little self-rule in the last half-millennium. Controlled by the Ottomans for centuries and considered a province of Yugoslavia — later Serbia — since 1912, the Assembly of Kosovo unilaterally declared its independence from Serbia on Feb. 17.

Now Kosovo faces its next challenge: Achieving the recognition of the international community. Some nations quickly welcomed Kosovo to the world stage; others — like Russia and China — are sympathetic to Serbia and labeled Kosovo as a rogue province. It came as no surprise when the United States became one of the first nations — along with the European Union — to formally recognize Kosovo as a sovereign and independent state.

"Nine years ago, the international community — led by NATO — acted to end brutal attacks on the Kosovar Albanian population," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a statement on the day Kosovo declared its independence. "This timely international intervention ended the violence, leading to a United Nations Security Council decision to suspend [Serbia's] governance. In light of the conflicts of the 1990s, independence is the only viable option to promote stability in the region."

The long road to independence has been bloody. The horrors of the 1999 Kosovo War, led by Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic against the ethnic Albanians of Kosovo, still linger in the minds of Kosovars. According to the 2007 CIA Factbook, 92 percent of the population of Kosovo is considered Albanian (90 percent of whom are Muslim).

A 2000 United Nations study reported that half of the Albanian population was forced to flee Kosovo during the war in 1999. Thousands more died. Many Albanians cite the tragedies of the Kosovo War — and their history of subjugation at the hands of so many people through history — as reason enough for their independence.

The idea that Kosovo and its majority Albanian population is entitled to independence is exactly what infuriates Serbia, China and Russia. If Kosovo is allowed to go, they say, every ethnic population in the world looking for its own independent nation is given the green light to do so. Eastern Europe and Asia have formed their own domino theory of the 21st century; it is the uncontrollable spread of democracy and autonomy — not communism — that frighten them and encourage us.

The success of Kosovo affects U.S. foreign relations. Kosovo is the Taiwan of Europe, a hot political issue that has the world's biggest powers lined up on opposite sides of the fence. It is unclear what steps Belgrade, Hong Kong or Moscow will take in the near future, as they argue against autonomy and in favor of the absolute power a nation holds over its subjects — the idea their regimes are built around and on which their futures depend.

A Feb. 22 article in The New York Times reported that 1,000 Serbian demonstrators attacked the U.S. embassy in Belgrade, Serbia's capital, forcing their way into the building and lighting several fires. The incident was sparked by protests of Kosovar independence. It serves as a reminder that the transition from province to free nation is far from over.

Though it appears Kosovo's history as an independent state is just beginning, the long struggle to maintain peace in the Balkans and between the world powers continues.

K-State fans should remain loyal

Though many K-State basketball fans felt disappointed and abandoned with the departure of former head Coach Bob Huggins at the end of last year's season, current head Coach Frank Martin and his talented group of 2007-08 recruits have taught us that there is no low K-State can't rise from.

This season, full of record-breaking games and memorable wins like the long-awaited victory over KU, has given K-State basketball fans a renewed hope for the possibility of a solid program. There is no doubt that fan enthusiasm and support are much higher than they have been in a while, and it is refreshing to see our students and fans coming together and backing the new coach and young team.

On this note, while the last few road games and last night's disappointing loss at home to Texas have not made it easy on the morale of the team and its fans, K-State supporters need to keep in mind that this doesn't signify a wasted season. A first-year head coach, rookie recruits they have played their hearts out this season trying to build a successful program from the ground up, and we should take pride in their accomplishments.

So don't let a few upsets hinder support and excitement for future games and seasons; the team needs encouragement from its school now more than ever, and they should not have to beg for it. So wear your purple T-shirts and camp out faithfully for the Colorado game. No one likes a fair-weather fan.

Use of tasers by law enforcement should be monitored

Fighting crime can be dirty, unfair and life-threatening — especially with a weapon in the wrong hands.

In recent years, a new weapon has appeared on the market claiming to have less lethal crime-fighting tactics.

Tasers, according to the Municipal Research and Services Center of Washington Web site, "are electronic stun weapons that are designed to temporarily disable or stop individuals without killing, thereby providing law enforcement, corrections personnel, or private citizens with an alternative to lethal force where appropriate."

Undoubtedly, such weapons prove safe against violent offenders. Anybody can turn on the Spike TV channel and watch an "outrageous moments" special showing some knife-wielding maniac being tased when all else fails.

However, there are flaws in every case. The inappropriate use of tasers is one flaw that cannot be ignored. And no, I'm not going to mention the "Don't tase me, bro" video on YouTube.com.

Far from that. The Minneapolis/St. Paul StarTribune reported Jan. 18 the grim story of Mark C. Backlund, resident of Fridley, Minn., who died following a tasing from police after being involved in a rush-hour crash. Reportedly, Backlund was being "uncooperative," in which case the police tased him. Backlund was rushed to a hospital, where he later died of heart failure. Details of the incident were not released, but the fact remains that Backlund became another statistic in the growing taser-related death count.

According to a report by Amnesty International released to the Department of Justice in September 2007, tasers are responsible for an estimated 300 deaths since 2001. Of these 300 deaths, only 25 of the victims were armed. Furthermore, the report introduces the chilling idea of possible abuse of power.

"We have documented disturbing instances where we believe that taser use has amounted to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment which is absolutely prohibited under international law," according to the report.

I don't personally condemn the use of tasers. But, as always, there are examples that back the notion Amnesty is trying to push. And it's when you hear reports like these that you must question whether any of these acts of self-defense.

On March 3, 2005, the Florida Times Union ran an article describing how police reportedly tased a young Jacksonville girl after apprehending her for arguing with her mother. After she slid out of her cuffs and resisted the police, a taser was used to stun the girl. She was only 13 years old.

However, that case is not even the tip of the iceberg.

On Sept. 19, 2007, the Orlando News reported that police were called to the home of a Clay County, Fla., resident in response to a family disturbance. There, the police found 56-year-old Emily Delafield, a mentally handicapped woman, armed with a hammer and two knives. She was bound to a wheelchair, and according to a family attorney, Rick Alexander, "They tased her 10 times for a period of, like, two minutes." Delafield died shortly after.

A 13-year-old girl and a mentally handicapped woman bound to a wheelchair — the last people who should be victimized by such a weapon.

It's true that police forces have come a long way in making law enforcement less lethal. Having 300 deaths caused by tasers since 2001 isn't entirely apocalyptic.

But when there are stories like the few mentioned above occurring on a continual basis, one should look into the use of these weapons in the hopes of finding a key to truly making them less lethal.

Whether it's the effects of the weapon or the mere conduct of those who use it, something must be done soon to control tasing.

Students celebrate 5th birthdays

By Elise Podhajsky
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leap day is this Friday, and students who were born in 1988 will finally celebrate their fifth birthdays.

The following article profiles students who were born in the 1956 leap year and was taken from the Feb. 27, 1976, Collegian, collectively written by the Collegian staff.

Happy Birthday, 5 year olds.

Feb. 29 is Sunday and, for eleven K-State students, extra celebration is called for. All were born on leap year's extra day, which is included on calendars once every four years. They have been alive for twenty years but can legally celebrate only their fifth birthday.

"I still get teased about being only 5 years old," said John Brettell, sophomore in political science. "It makes me mad sometimes, but you have to learn to get along with it."

Brettell usually celebrates his birthday on Feb. 28, except when he was overseas.

"I lived in Brazil for nine years, and they thought it was an oddity. They make it more of a big deal overseas, and they celebrate it on March 1," Brettell said.

Brettell has not made any big plans for celebration yet.

Dan and David Groff, will be having a double celebration. The brothers are identical twins born on Feb. 29.

"It's even more special when two people are born on a day that comes once every four years," said David, freshman in education.

"It's the first time we have had a birthday in four years. We are going to have a big party Friday night, and then, we are going home Sunday for a big thing," said Dan Groff, sophomore in speech pathology.

"About my eighth birthday, I really understood that I was not going to have a birthday for the next four years," Lynda Terrill, sophomore in biology, said.

This year, Terrill is planning to have a party to celebrate the special day.

"We celebrated on the 28th unless March 1 fell on a Friday. Usually, it was whenever it was convenient for my dad," Terrill said.

"I always look forward to the years I do have a birthday. Usually, we celebrate on February 28, but for a couple of years, the second right between the 28th and the 1st, my little brother would wake me up and wish me a Happy Birthday," Reggie Van Pelt, sophomore in pre-design professions, said.

"My parents always made it kind of a special thing, like you were different in an unusual way," Van Pelt said.

When transferring schools one time, Van Pelt had a hard time convincing a secretary that Feb. 29 really existed.

"She got irate. She about told us to get out of there," Van Pelt said.

Diane Sebesta, sophomore in math, celebrates her birthday on Feb. 28 "because it comes sooner."

"I'm going home [Wilson, Kan.], which is special in itself," Sebesta said about this year.

Sebesta met two other girls who share the famous birth date. All three are members of K-State's Marching Band.

"We can't really make it that special of a deal because I also have a cousin who was born on the same day, the same year, and almost the same house," Sebesta said.

To keep the family peace, Peggy Nightengale, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, celebrates her birthday on both Feb. 28 and March 1.

"My dad thinks my birthday is the day after February 28 so I should celebrate on March 1. My mom says I was born in February so I should celebrate in February."

"On the 28th, my mom will give me a present and the 1st my dad will give me a present," Nightengale explained.

Nightengale has taken her fair share of teasing because of her unusual birth date.

"I've gotten used to it because they really tease me a lot. They've really been heckling me this year because I will have a birthday. People think it's something different."

"If I couldn't take teasing, I'd be in trouble," Nightengale said.

This year, Peggy plans to go to Colorado to ski to celebrate.

David L. Griffin Sr., associate dean for diversity in secondary education, came to K-State 16 years ago after serving as a high-school principal in the Kansas City school district.

Professor strives for diversity education, serves as a role model for K-State students

By Jasmine Hammond
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An office filled with awards, pictures and fish tanks shows he is a warm, caring and accomplished person.

The cuff of his sleeve is emblazoned with the initials "DLG," and his matching sweater vest and nicely creased slacks shows this man is always dressing sharp.

David L. Griffin Sr., associate dean for diversity in secondary education, has done a great deal in striving for diversity at K-State.

"I'm a walking example," he said. "I try to live what I do in my classroom. I live and breathe who I am. I celebrate diversity. I acknowledge, respect and recognize differences in people."

Griffin is in his 16th year at K-State and his fourth year as assistant dean for diversity.

He said he did not plan on staying at K-State that long, but as time has passed, the more he has enjoyed it.

Michael Holen, dean of education, recruited Griffin while he was a principal in the Kansas City school district and attending the University of Missouri at Kansas City.

"David was an exceptional principal and leader in education," Holen said.

Holen and other faculty members came to Griffin about working at K-State and also working toward his doctorate degree.

"I was David's doctoral adviser," Holen said. "He started as an assistant dean for diversity part time. He was playing such a valuable role that made him a full-time dean."

Because he is a black faculty member, he said he has had students at K-State who have challenged him.

"I would tell my students, 'If you want to challenge me, let me give you some advice,'" Griffin said. "Put your mind in gear before you put your mouth in motion."

Griffin also has been involved in Athletic Alliance and the Black Student Union, and he is a former president of Black Faculty. He is also the faculty adviser of Alpha Phi Alpha, a historically black fraternity.

"I'm an Alpha man," he stated with pride.

Careem Gladney, senior and finance and president of Alpha Phi Alpha, described Griffin as a great role model.

"One time, I was in his office, and I saw his wall filled with plaques and accolades displaying his impact on diversity," Gladney said. "He has made a difference through many organizations and avenues."

Beasley breaks Boozer's record, Wildcats still can't beat Horns

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freshman forward Michael Beasley set a new K-State record, but the Wildcats could not overcome a Texas squad that shot 55 percent from the floor in the second half. K-State lost to the No. 5 Longhorns, 74-65, Monday at Bramlage Coliseum.

"They've been playing better than any team in the country," Beasley said. "They're a good team. They defend. They have a whole army. We played our hearts out, but we couldn't come up with a win."

Beasley's 11th 30-point performance broke Bob Boozer's career record of ten. Beasley also nabbed 15 boards, which is his 24th double-double, one shy of Kansas' Drew Gooden's Big 12 record. Beasley said despite the records, he couldn't be happy with a loss.

"I'm heartbroken, I'm down," he said. "We put our hearts on the line. We gave it our all."

Texas (24-4, 11-2 Big 12 Conference) quickly jumped out to a 6-2 lead, with four of those points coming from sophomore guard D.J. Augustin. K-State battled back, eventually taking the lead with 2:02 left in the first period on a layup from freshman guard Jacob Pullen. K-State and Texas finished the period tied with 30 points apiece.

K-State (18-9, 8-5 Big 12) came out in the second half, extending its lead to five twice, first on a layup from Beasley and then again, on a three-point shot from Pullen. The game was stuck at 50-50 for almost two minutes until Texas' junior forward Connor Atchley tipped the ball in for Texas to break the tie. Atchley's basket sparked a 7-0 Texas run capped off by a three-point play by Augustin. Texas never relinquished the lead, only letting K-State get as close as three, following a free throw by Beasley at the 5:45 mark.

"[Texas] didn't get discouraged," coach Frank Martin said. "Abrams finally got some looks. I think where the game cost us was we stopped rebounding the ball on the defensive end. They got some put-backs and that took the wind out of our sails."

Pullen was K-State's second-highest scorer, notching 19 points and a team-high four assists. Junior forward Andre Gilbert also had six points for the Wildcats, and also five rebounds. K-State only shot 32 percent from the floor for the entire game, including 25 percent from beyond the arc. Even with the loss, Martin said he refused to let the guys get down on themselves.

"I couldn't be prouder of a basketball team than I am of our guys," he said. "I just told them in the locker room that if they have one bad week a year in life, that's a pretty damn successful life. We haven't had a very good week this week as far as winning and losing. We have to regroup and we have to come in here and stay

Sampson's NCAA violation similar to MLB steroids issue

After what has taken place with former Indiana basketball coach Kelvin Sampson over the past week and his contract buyout because of a violation of NCAA rules, I have reached my own conclusion.

Impermissible calls — the major violation the NCAA has charged Sampson with — must be similar to the apparent competitive edge Major League Baseball is dealing with in terms of steroids.

Sampson's short stay at Indiana started with an announcement of violations shortly after he accepted the position. The NCAA initially found Sampson made 577 impermissible calls between 2000 and 2004 when he was the coach at Oklahoma. Sampson was punished with recruiting restrictions.

In the most recent findings through an investigation by Indiana, it was reported that Sampson made more than 100 additional impermissible calls, including ten three-way calls: another violation.

For those reasons, Sampson is no longer the coach at Indiana, and he is in the middle of a controversy as potentially serious as the steroids crisis is for baseball.

The question of how many calls a coach should be able to make and whether text messages should be allowed between coaches and players is not a new one.

There is no doubt in my mind that a coach gains some sort of competitive advantage when he has extra communication with a recruit. After all, communication between coaches and players is one of the bigger factors involved in recruiting.

If the violation Sampson had to talking on the phone is anywhere comparable to what Barry Bonds allegedly had to steroids, then you have to believe it is a wide-scale problem and, like the baseball players who were discovered to be users prior to the Mitchell Report, only a few have been caught.

From what we know in the findings from investigations at Oklahoma and Indiana, Sampson likes to talk to his recruits as much as the stereotypical middle school-aged child.

Unfortunately, scientists have yet to develop any tests to determine which of the phone-related violations coaches are guilty of. Any coach can get a private line and make extra calls at his own expense. If you had the right phone and the right plan, you could even save money on long calls to

Walker, K-State struggle to make shots from beyond arc

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For whatever reason, K-State just couldn't get shots to fall Monday against Texas.

Freshman forward Bill Walker came out the biggest victim of the shooting woes, and the Wildcats fell 74-65 to the Longhorns at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats shot a season-low 32.8 percent from the field. The previous worst of the season was Feb. 9 when K-State shot 38.7 percent in a 82-61 win over Oklahoma State.

"[Texas] just stayed the course and we missed some [chip shots]," K-State coach Frank Martin said.

For Martin, the biggest difference in the game — in terms of shooting — was from the three-point range. The Wildcats were 7-of-27 from long range.

"We played just as hard when we played KU [at home]," Martin said. "What's the difference? We made three-pointers, KU missed. Tonight, they made theirs, and we missed ours."

Walker, the Wildcats' second-leading scorer, averaging 16.8 points per game, finished the contest with one point.

The freshman was 0-for-4 from three-point range, where he is the team leader in Big 12 Conference play with 18 three-pointers made, and 0-for-14 overall. Texas sophomore guard D.J.

Augustin attributed Walker's night to the Longhorn team's defense and called it "one of those games in basketball."

"Bill: he's a great player, he just had a rough night," Augustin said. "That happens in basketball."

The Wildcats managed to get a 19-point performance from freshman guard Jacob Pullen in the absence of Walker's usual points.

Martin wasn't disappointed in Walker's game. As he pointed out, it was nothing new for the Texas defense to stop a quality player.

"He tried his heart out. Bill played as hard as he could play," he said. "Bill defended, he went after balls. Give Texas some credit. They did the same thing to Kevin Love at UCLA and Love — last time I checked — is a pretty good player."

The Wildcats' 25.9 percent shooting from behind the three-point line was nowhere near their season low, but Texas shot 10-for-22 from long range including a stretch of three straight three-point baskets to take a 50-47 lead with 11:46 left in the game. Ultimately, those nine points were the difference in the final score.

Texas shot well from the field, finishing the game shooting 47.4 percent, including 55.2 percent in the second half.

Other than the Oklahoma State game, it was the first time K-State shot under 40 percent in a game since the Dec. 9 game against California, in which the Wildcats shot 39.1 percent. Still, K-State won that game 82-75 even with Cal shooting 50 percent.

In its previous two losses at Nebraska and at Baylor, K-State made fewer than ten three-pointers.

The Wildcats made 12 in their win over then No. 2-ranked KU on Jan. 30.

PEOPLE IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

UPC director shares joys, frustrations of planning events, helping students

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Union Program Council Director Ben Hopper has worked at K-State for about four years, and he said he loves working with college students and helping them reach their planning goals.

How would you describe your job?

My title is "program adviser," and I get to work with 20 student leaders on campus who plan about 180 events a year. I advise three of the eight committees that the [Union Program Council] has, and I work with all of the students with everything from booking the talents, working out the details, decorations, things for the events, promotions. Really whatever the students want to do, I just help them make it happen. If they want to bring a famous comedian, actor, a band, I help them put that vision together and advise them to make it happen.

Do students have to interview to be leaders with UPC?

Yes, the deadline is actually coming up in March. We're constantly recruiting people to get involved. We have about 20 to 40 committee members, and it's been a steady increase. We meet every other Tuesday night at 5:30 in Union Station, and there's always free food at the meetings. We have eight committees that have two co-chairs each, except After Hours has three co-chairs. We have 20 people on our executive council.

What have been some of the most exciting events that you've planned with UPC?

Over the past four years, we've had so many events, it's hard to say one is my favorite. They've all been successful. The Union Expo and activities carnivals in the fall and the Wildcat Warm-ups in the spring – those have always been fun. But people remember the Will Ferrells, the Ice-Ts. There's no reason why any event we do can't be memorable, so I encourage the students to make the events more than just events. Like we showed "The Phantom of the Opera" and made the lobby look like the Paris opera house and made a chandelier. Any event that we do could be an awesome, special event.

How did the idea for After Hours come about?

It started out as "First Fridays" in 2000 or 2001. A lot of campuses and student unions were trying to provide alternatives to Friday nights to provide safe, substance-free entertainment, crafts, food, activities. It got special funding from the student government. It proved successful, so it's now every Friday night. We do everything from hypnotists to grocery bingo. A Western night is coming up; we did Mission Improvable last week. After Hours is funded by privilege fees that students pay with tuition. Our students are good stewards of the money. We conduct surveys constantly and find out what people want. We try to bring a diversity of activities.

What is one of your favorite aspects of your position?

Having an opportunity to work with the students. We've had some amazing students in the last four years. I've kept in touch with basically all of them. It keeps me going. It's what I want to do for a career – work with college-aged students. It's a unique time in their lives, and it's refreshing to work with some of K-State's brightest, creative leaders.

What is one of the hardest aspects of your job?

Working with the students. Our leaders are so involved and busy on campus. It's hard to organize the things that we do with the students. They do five office hours a week, but it's always more than that because we do so many events. It's a challenge working with their class schedules. We went shopping for K-State Idol last night, and it was hard finding a chunk of time to run by Hobby Lobby. There are also so many cool things out there to pick from – entertainers, musicians – it's just a challenge to see what would be a good fit at K-State. Sometimes we bring in the Will Ferrells that do well, and sometimes we bring in comedians that don't do well,

Matt Castro | COLLEGIAN

Ben Hopper, Union Program Council director, has been working at K-State for about four years. His job includes advising committees, working with student leaders and planning events.

but if the students have had a good experience, then it was worth it.

Where are you from?

I'm originally from Leonardville, Kan. It's the home of Merlin Potts, the world champion horseshoe pitcher. It's about 30 miles from Manhattan. I graduated from K-State in agricultural communications and journalism, with a minor in political science and agricultural economics. I worked as a lobbyist and came back and am in graduate school in college personnel and education because this is what I want to do for the rest of my life is work in higher education.

What are some long-term goals you have for UPC?

Some goals for UPC are to maintain the quantity and quality of programs we do, which is a challenge because the cost of programs keeps going up. Keeping the quality of students we have, partnering more with other organizations on campus.

restaurant management, both filed formal complaints on an item in Bryan Cox's expense report.

Eakin dismissed the complaints Monday evening, but Andy Glazier said he planned to appeal early this morning.

The complaints are about T-shirt costs. Glazier said Cox, junior in political science, might have failed to list a discount on his campaign T-shirts.

One of the rules for campaigning prohibit presidential candidates from receiving discounts on items without reporting the difference in price as a donation. Candidates will be disqualified if they receive more than $800 via donations from non-students.

Cox's outside donations add up to exactly $800, so if the appeal is successful, Cox might be disqualified for accepting too much money in donations.

Cox said the cheaper-than-normal T-shirt prices were listed after a price-match with another T-shirt company in Wamego, Kan. He explained the discount would have been available to any member of the public and was not a personal discount, so it did not need to be listed.

Glazier argued for the complaint. Glazier said he bought a domain name from www.godaddy.com, but he received it for a cheaper price as a promotion available to any member of the public.

Glazier said Eakin required him to list the discount on his expense report as a donation and said the situation is similar to Cox's.

Cox's shirts cost about $4.30 per shirt, while Peele's cost around $3.23 per shirt before her recorded discount.

Eakin explained Peele bought plain shirts for cheap and had them printed, while Cox went to just one source for his shirts, which is why Peele's shirts were cheaper.

A decision on Glazier's appeal will be made some time today.

SCHOLARS | DSP helps K-State maintain land-grant status

doing research in every college on campus, Cortez said. Many of the scholars have gone on to become Rhodes Scholars finalists, be accepted to medical schools and even earn doctorate degrees.

The program also helps K-State to achieve its status as a top-10 land-grant university, she said. Cortez said this is possible through DSP students participating in research with published faculty members.

"How many freshmen do you know, for example, who are doing research in the lab in [the College of Veterinary Medicine]?" Cortez said. "If they do this from their freshman year all the way through, just think of the experience they have when they go on to graduate school."

Cortez said the scholars not only have learned more from hands-on experience, but they are surrounded with a network of experts in their fields.

"Often, faculty live in their 'world' - doing research, attending seminars - and students are doing homework and attending their own organizations and events, so the only time the faculty and students have much contact is during the lecture," she said. "But, in our program they interact with each other all week long."

Cortez said the program is a two-way street. Faculty learn from working with students from multiple racial, social and economic backgrounds, while students get to know professors not only as researchers, but as people, she said.

"This enriches the whole college experience for the both sides," she said.

COLUMN | Sports violations inevitable

numerous reports.

If you just think about all the ways a coach could hide calls from his school, you think more about the possibility that it is more widespread than believed.

When you think of all the apparent competitive edges which are gained in sports (steroids in baseball, extra phone calls in college sports, fan riots in soccer and metal chairs in professional wrestling) you realize that the ways to stop or even limit them are few and far between.

To say recruiting violations are as big a problem for college sports as steroids are for some professional sports might be a bit of a stretch. As the problem persists, it will continue to compare to that issue more and more.

No matter which sport you are talking about, there will always be a competitive edge to discuss, and the day when they go away is no time soon. The only solution is to keep weaving out the Sampsons and Bonds of the sports world until only the ones we don't know about are left violating the rules.

positive."

Leading the scoring for Texas was Augustin, who had 24, and Atchley, who had 14. Junior guard A.J. Abrams led the Longhorns from the perimeter with 13 points, including four of seven from beyond the arc, all of which came in the second half.

"As long as we play with great effort, that's all we ask," Texas coach Rick Barnes said. "We ask for great effort, mentally as well as physically. The fact is, we came in and beat a good basketball team. We have to keep worrying about ourselves and what we need to do."

After four games in eight days, K-State will get a little break before heading to Allen Fieldhouse Saturday to take on KU. Martin said although his team is on a three-game losing streak, he's confident his team will get healthy again.

"You want to get healthy during a season? Get a win," he said. "Nothing gets a team healthier than a win. We've got to go get a win. We have to worry about getting a win so we can get a better seed in the Big 12 Tournament."

TV Show offers viewers relateable anecdotes

"quarterlife"

★★★★☆

Review by Adrienne DeWeese

Every now and then, a TV show comes along that makes its audience members think about their own lives because they relate so well with its characters' intimate anecdotes.

"quarterlife," which features six 25-year-olds making the transition from post-college graduation into the notorious real world in Chicago, is an example of such a TV show.

The show debuted in November 2007 as an Internet series at MySpaceTV.com, but NBC will air "quarterlife" as an hour-long drama series starting at 9 to-night. After the premiere, "quarterlife" will move to a regular time slot at 8 p.m. Sundays starting March 2.

Viewers might initially think, "Wait. Haven't we already seen this show? Didn't it run for 10 years on NBC, and wasn't it called 'Friends'?"

The plot lines and characters might parallel certain elements of "Friends," but "quarterlife" contains quirkiness and technological advancements for the 21st century.

Take, for example, the show's main character, Dylan Krieger (Bitsie Tulloch). Krieger is an associate editor at a woman's magazine called "Attitude" where other people often take credit for her innovative ideas. She's a writer who voices her life and its daily happenings through a video blog at quarterlife.com.

Krieger's best friend, Debra Locatelli (Michelle Lombardo), is the stereotypical "pretty friend" who works at her father's appliance store and suffers from anxiety problems after a breakup with the love of her life, Danny Franklin (David Walton).

The show also has made TV network history. "quarterlife" is the first Internet series to make the transition to traditional network TV. Members of the actual "quarterlife" Web site also have the opportunity to have their music, photographs and videos incorporated as a character on the show, making it the first user-generated TV show in history.

"quarterlife" is the brainchild of Marshall Herskovitz and Edward Zwick, who also developed "My So-Called Life," "thirtysomething," "Legends of the Fall" and "Blood Diamond."

The Internet version of "quarterlife" includes 26, eight-minute episodes with two new episodes each week.

NBC formatted the show into an hour-long drama that will continue for five weeks.

The show also has an accompanying social network with "a community for artists, thinkers and do-ers." Viewers can read the characters' blogs and interests on the site; it's like spending close and personal "Web time" with fictional TV characters.

"quarterlife" offers college students a glimpse into the crystal ball of their futures. Its characters are humorous, warmhearted and yet they remain realistic and personable.

The plot lines feature scenarios as messy as real life without embedded "reality TV" drama, but at the end of the day, the characters just laugh it off with a drink at the bars with their friends.

Shoes...

omg, shoes

Old footwear can be craftily made over

There are some occasions when boredom turns into creativity.

For most of winter break, I was stuck working in Manhattan, spending several afternoons alone in my apartment – and Facebook.com could entertain me for only so long.

On one such occasion, I was pulling clothes, shoes and accessories from my closet when I realized one pair of well-loved shoes probably shouldn't be worn any longer. These bright pink Mary Jane flats with pink bows were too scuffed to make any more public appearances.

In some cases, I could go out and buy a touch-up paint made just for shoes, but I knew I would be hard-pressed to find any in hot pink. So I sat on the floor holding one of the shoes and pondering. Then I had a bright idea.

I decided to use shoe paint to make the shoes white, and then use permanent markers to graffiti all over them. The shoe paint applicator was actually a little sponge, so it created a certain effect on the shoes, and I let a little pink show through. I even left the bows pink.

When the paint was dry, I used the brightly colored markers to draw little hearts, stars, musical notes, squiggles and other girly designs all over the shoes. To fill in some empty spaces, I wrote words that meant a lot to me in bright colors.

I realized these "new" shoes were bright and quirky, which are qualities I sometimes think I possess.

The biggest surprise for me was the number of comments I got on the shoes and people asking where I got them.

Ever since I discovered how fun it was to go Martha Stewart all over my shoes, I have been wishing I had a few more scuffed-up pairs. All kinds of new ideas – some good and some bad – have been racing through my mind.

A friend of mine has hot-glued buttons on shoes, and this could be especially good for covering up some minor flaws and adding flair to an old pair. Since I've been on my shoe-makeover craze, I've actually been looking for a pair of shoes that would look cute with some random buttons.

And honestly, the possibilities are endless. You don't have to stick to markers and buttons. With a little glue, ribbons can jazz up a pair of old shoes, or to bring out the inner diva, use glitter or some well-placed rhinestones. Look around your room or wander through a craft store. I'm sure you'll find something special you can plaster all over a shoe to spice it up.

My latest effort was to decoupage a shoe. I chose a black, pointed-toe slingback, and I wanted to put newsprint on it.

JACQUE
HAAG

TIPS FOR TOUCHING UP OLD SHOES:

-Try something on just a small area. If it doesn't work, you can try to cover it up or camouflage it with something else.
-Think practically. Will this process make the shoe uncomfortable? Will this decoration be able to handle a lot of walking or extreme weather?
-Protect your artsy shoes with a water-repellent spray so the paint doesn't rub off or rain doesn't ruin your decoupage.

I really don't have much experience with decoupage, but I like to be adventurous. I bought some decoupage glue, cut up a newspaper and went to work.

Along with my inexperience using decoupage, I wasn't even sure one could decoupage a shoe or what steps I should be taking. This really was a complete experiment.

But I followed the directions, and I ended up with something I'm fairly excited about, but I'll admit – it's the nerdy journalist in me. You don't have to use newsprint; magazine pages would make one shoe like a colorful collage.

The idea is to be inventive. Step outside the (shoe) box and find something to decorate with. That's when you'll have a one-of-a-kind shoe that can really express you.

In addition to using your creativity, the key is to not worry if it doesn't work. You have an old pair of shoes that you're going to throw out anyway. So spend a few bucks and an hour trying something new, and if it doesn't work, you're probably not too far behind – in your budget or your schedule.

MUSIC REVIEW

New York group creates mature, cohesive debut album

"All Hour Cymbals"

Review by Mark Sibilla

Brooklyn, N.Y., has birthed countless influential indie-rock bands during the first part of the 21st century. Each has had a knack for combining pop music aesthetics with surreal and tribal styles that give the music a distinct otherworldly feel. Bands like TV on the Radio, Animal Collective and Grizzly Bear are some of the most prominent of this new wave of musical pioneers.

This winter, a much-hyped quartet emerged from the New York suburbs combining Western pop structures with world-music rhythms and adventurous instrumentation. The band is Yeasayer, and its debut album, "All Hour Cymbals" is strong enough to suggest that the band easily could join the ranks of its contemporaries in experimental rock.

On paper, "All Hour Cymbals" seems like it would be a terrible album, a jumbled mess of odd rhythms and Beach Boys harmonies set to a soundtrack of sitars, accordions, steel drums, children's choirs and whatever else the band feels like throwing into the mix. But what makes the album truly special is how the members of Yeasayer are able to reign in all the disparate elements and create an album that is weird and wild, yet sounds entirely grounded in this world.

"Sunrise" opens the album by combining soul vocals of the 1960s with handclaps and an austere piano line. The track is slowly taken over by droning synthesizers and thundering drums as lead singer Chris Keating sings about lyrics that mirror the mythological tale of Icarus.

"As the trees grew higher and higher/And the fish began to fly/I went and stole some wings and thought, 'Why can't I?'"

Yeasayer makes music that sounds like there is no difference between Eastern and Western musical ideologies. Everything is fair game on "All Hour Cymbals."

"Wait for the Summer" is a ritualistic rave-up that sounds like a combination of a gypsy folk dance and bombastic Middle Eastern harmonies courtesy of a lively sitar. Many of the tracks on "All Hour Cymbals" deal with coming to terms with or making peace with unexpected events in life.

Single "2080" was passed around iTunes and MySpace.com like a hipster hot potato. It was one of the singles to name drop during the last months of 2007 and the beginning of 2008.

The track begins somewhat forebodingly with the lyrics, "I can't sleep when I think about the times we're living in/I can't sleep when I think about the future I was born into." But following two choruses, the song shifts as the band breaks down into a series of "Yeah Yeah Yeahs" that give the song a more uplifting feel that ends the track with a children's choir and communal chanting.

The subject of "Forgiveness" is fairly easy to discern, but it is the song's interesting time changes and shifting melodies that makes it truly interesting.

And then there is the aesthetic opposite of "Wait for the Summer" appropriately titled "Wait for the Winter time." Where the former track was lithe and joyous, the latter track chugs along on a sludgy Black Sabbath-like riff over which disembodied shouts and aggressive chanting propel the song throughout its five-minute run time.

Despite all the musical detours explored on "All Hour Cymbals," Yeasayer is a talented-enough young band that it is able to combine seemingly disparate styles into a mature and highly cohesive debut. Yeasayer should be proud to be considered among one of New York's finest new bands of the year.

Becoming an 'Idol'

Judges from the K-State community added colorful commentary to their performance critiques at Tuesday's K-State Idol competition.

K-State students compete to earn top performance

By Jenna Scavuzzo
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Talent, confidence and animation resonated from K-State students' vocal performances as they brought a collegiate version of 'American Idol' to life Tuesday night.

K-State and the Union Program Council sponsored its 4th annual K-State Idol Bandstand at 7 p.m. in Forum Hall. Ten students performed renditions of modern and classic songs or their own composed pieces and competed for the recognition as "K-State's Most Talented Performer" by the bandstand's judges.

Lindsay Ibarra, freshman in public relations, was the winner of the competition and received a $300 prize. Ibarra sang "Someone to Watch Over Me," originally performed by George Gershwin, a famous classical composer.

Ibarra said she was shocked she received first place and was nervous before she performed because she had been ill.

"I just auditioned as something to do for fun," Ibarra said. "I've never done it before. Performing in front of the crowd was such a rush — I just looked out to the crowd and sang, and it went by really fast. When the emcees announced the winners, I was completely and genuinely surprised."

Donnie Hampton, sophomore in management and UPC's music chairman, said he was pleased with the judge's decision.

"Lindsay's very original," Hampton said. "She brought life to an older song, and I think the judges and crowd really enjoyed that. She was very confident and had great vocal performance."

Deborah Muhwezi and Jasmine Hammond, junior and freshman in journalism and mass communications, respectively, sang a duet to the hymn, "I'll Fly Away" and won second place, along with $200 in prize money.

Tiffany Henry, junior in elementary education, and Marissa Shepherd, senior in apparel and textiles, sang a rendition of "With a Little Help From My Friends," originally performed by The Beatles. They were awarded third place and received $100.

The K-State Cadence singers opened and concluded the '50s-themed bandstand, and the show's judges spoke to the singers after they concluded their performances.

This is the first year UPC has partnered with Educational Communicators Center to put a recording of Tuesday's performance on K-State's cable channel, said Ben Hopper, UPC program adviser. Hopper said he was also pleased with how the competition went. He said plans are already being formulated for next year's K-State Idol event.

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist advises student reporters to dig deeper for stories

Jonathan Knight | COLLEGIAN

MSNBC investigative reporter Bill Dedman speaks to participants Tuesday in Kedzie 220. Dedman spent Monday and Tuesday speaking to journalism students about different ways to organize and improve their reporting.

By David L. Griffin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time journalists get out of the press box and into the stands because observation is the key to reporting, a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist told K-State students this week.

Bill Dedman, investigative reporter for MSNBC.com, spent Monday and Tuesday presenting workshops to K-State journalism students.

The overarching theme for the sessions, which were sponsored by the Tilford Group, was "Internet Strategies for a Global Society."

Dedman said he works toward positive development of writers by giving them advice about how to better their writing and reporting skills.

For example, he said sports reporters sit in the press box while team officials provide statistics and quotes that every other reporter will have, even those not in the press box.

"Their stories have no color — they hit the ground hard," Dedman said during a lecture titled "Writing Clearly by Reporting Clearly."

Journalists need to make their stories more than just black and white, he said.

Some stories are more complicated, and thorough reporting might lead reporters to conclusions that explain how processes actually work.

Reporters have no problem telling statistics and what they know, but they don't like giving away what they don't know, he said, because, "We might give others an idea of what we're going to write about tomorrow."

Kim Baltrip, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications and Collegian adviser, said Dedman's presentation to students was informative and useful because he challenges his listeners to use different media outlets.

"I do believe that too often, students don't dig deep enough to add substance to their story," Baltrip said.

Dedman explained that journalists must separate themselves to truly get an "amazing" story.

He spoke about a Wall Street Journal reporter who consistently got the wrong phone number when calling 411 for directory assistance and then conducted an experiment that involved more than 250 phone calls and multiple wrong numbers.

"It's the observation and doing something different that makes the stories special," Dedman said.

One Castro, two Castro

Raúl's differences from Fidel leave hope for many

At age 81, Fidel Castro, communist dictator of Cuba, announced on Feb. 19 that he would not seek another term as leader of the Caribbean nation. The Cuban National Assembly elected his brother and former vice president Raúl Castro as Cuban president five days later.

Raúl Castro has always been known as the enforcer of his brother's policies while serving underneath him in a few different offices. He has been with him since he took the presidential office in January 1959.

Fidel made life better for many of Cuba's poorer residents, but it didn't come without a price. He no longer held free elections and fired or punished those who opposed him with violence or imprisonment. He also imprisoned many homosexuals.

The Pink News, the self-proclaimed largest gay news service in Europe, stated in an article shortly after Fidel's resignation that "sexual diversity was seen by Fidel Castro as a corrupt consequence of capitalism ... Castro's regime [attempted to] 're-educate' homosexuals. Gays were incarcerated in Military Units to Aid Production between 1965 and 1968."

Fidel's intolerance for diversity, along with his inability at times to properly care for the impoverished led many Cubans to flee their country.

When Raúl temporarily served as president while Fidel was hospitalized in 2006, U.S. citizens speculated what would happen if he actually did become the president of Cuba.

According to a Time magazine article published Aug. 1, 2006, Raúl has always been known as "the practical Castro."

The article said if he were to succeed Fidel permanently, many Cuba watchers speculate he would actually bring a less confrontational rule to Cuba.

"I think he will try to adopt more of a China economic model, probably continuing much of the harsh political regime but allowing more private enterprise and loosening foreign investment rules," said a senior researcher at the University of Miami's Cuba

Institute and author of the recently published book "After Fidel." "And I think he's also going to want better relations and more dialogue with the U.S."

Fidel's extreme policies and radical Communist government overhauls came at a price to the United States, which lost land, troops and business when attempting to remove him from office.

The U.S. government has a 44-year-old economic embargo on Cuban goods coming into the country and citizens remain hopeful that relations between Cuba and the United States will improve now that Fidel is permanently out of office.

However, it is important not to forget that while Fidel is gone, there is still a Castro in office. Though Raúl is seen as more level-minded, he was still his brother's keeper for many years and doesn't have many views that differ from his brother.

An article in Time magazine stated that Raúl became a Communist at a young age and will have to "loosen the leash" on Cuban residents before they begin to support him. The U.S. government must be just as cautious as it's always been in the months ahead as he gets used to his position as the leader of Cuba.

Raúl Castro has much cleaning up and apologizing to do, and until he does, both Cubans and Americans will still be against him.

Respect for opposing points of view essential for effective debate, discourse

Philosopher Francois-Marie Arouet, better known as Voltaire, said, "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

The United States finds its foundation in this idea — the idea that one has the right to express their opinions no matter what. And it is essential that as a society we uphold this principle, because only through the discussion of ideas will we find what is best for our nation.

All too often those who express minority opinions are shouted down by their opponents, and the pursuit of solutions through debate are replaced by the over-arching desire to defeat those with whom one disagrees.

Rather than debating ideas, there is an inclination to vilify our opponents — to attack their character rather than discuss the merits of their position. This tendency toward vilification can be seen over and over again, from the presidential campaign trail to the Collegian Fourum. It is a disturbing trend and an affront to the ideals on which our country is founded.

Benjamin R. Barber, author of "Jihad vs. McWorld," said in an interview with the New York Times that there has always existed "a rhetorical incivility within ... boundaries, which is a healthy manifestation of conflict and disagreement."

However, Barber said those boundaries have eroded and another kind of incivility has emerged. "People yell at each other," he said. "They talk at the same time. There's almost no listening and no visible modification of opinion, and there is a vilification of opponents, all of which is taken as ordinary discourse."

This surely isn't what the Founding Fathers had in mind when they amended the Constitution to ensure that the citizens of the United States had the right to freedom of expression. The First Amendment was ratified in order to ensure the free exchange of ideas, and anybody willing to stand up and debate those ideas deserves more than personal attacks and belittlement.

JESSICA HENSLEY

Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

Disagreement is one of the building blocks of democracy — it is only through honest and thorough debate that progress is made.

The eminent 19th century writer John Stuart Mill contended that enlightened judgment is possible only if one considers all ideas and tests one's own conclusions against opposing views. Debate is essential to the pursuit of truth and progress, but people must be willing to listen to their opponents and accept that there is more than one valid solution to a problem.

We live in a pluralist society and it is necessary that we be able to accept opposing viewpoints. Personal attacks and vilification are indicators of weak ideas and weak minds and are beneath us as a society. Instead, we should engage in thoughtful and high-minded debate. Only then will we be able to find viable solutions to the problems that we face as a nation.

Entrants should advertise stances

Two of the most difficult parts of campaigning in any election are getting voters to listen to and support your message, and making sure those voters go to the polls. The four campaigns running for Student Government Association president and vice president have some support from students, [some more than others] but to make sure more students go to the polls, these candidates will have to get specific.

While a catchy slogan is advantageous, it doesn't motivate students who are not personally familiar with the campaign. What students should be concerned with are the plans and actions that candidates will use.

Voter apathy is not uncommon in the United States, and K-State is no exception. According to U.S. Census data from the 2004 elections, only 64 percent of Americans of legal age voted for a presidential candidate. According to the data on the SGA elections Web site, fewer than 15 percent of all students voted in the primary last year, and only about 25 percent voted in the general election. If candidates want to motivate students, they need to explain why a vote for one candidate will be more beneficial than a vote for another.

We are sure that all four campaigns have good ideas on how to improve K-State, but we want to know how those ideas will become a concrete plan. Vote at the SGA elections Web site at www.ksu.edu/elections.

TO THE POINT is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

K-State graduate reflects on effects of rape to educate other women

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Darcy Hamilton said she never felt comfortable in her house. She always locked every door and window and said she did not like to stay there alone. At the beginning of fall 2005, Darcy said she thought someone came into her house, but she said decided later it was probably a dream. Two weeks later, she was raped by a man the K-State and Manhattan community have come to know as the "Manhattan serial rapist."

SERIAL RAPIST HISTORY

According to a Sept. 19, 2007, Collegian article, seven rapes have been linked to the Manhattan serial rapists since Oct. 1, 2000. Riley County Police Department Capt. Tim Hegarty said Hamilton was one of the victims.

In the article, Kristen Kendrick, then a graduate student in sociology, was writing a thesis on the effects of the rapist on the K-State and Manhattan community. She said the rapist generally attacks his victims, usually white college-aged females, early in the morning between 1 a.m. and 5 a.m. when they are alone in their house.

Hamilton, who graduated with a bachelor's degree in journalism and mass communications last fall, experienced this information first hand.

THE YEARS BEFORE

Before she attended K-State, Hamilton attended Fort Hays State University, where she played volleyball.

One night, she and her sister were out partying. Hamilton said she ended up drinking too much, and passed out on the couch. Her sister tried to get her to come home but couldn't, so she left the party.

When Hamilton woke up, she knew something had happened to her.

"I don't remember anything but when I woke up," she said. "My underwear was inside out. I had no clue what was going on, and I asked [the boys in the house] what went on and they didn't tell me what went on. I had shorts on, and I was trying to find my clothes."

Later, a friend took her to the hospital because Hamilton was worried after some people told her she was raped. She had writing on her body, and later found out people at the party video-taped what happened.

Soon after, Hamilton left FHSU and transferred to K-State.

THE WEEKS BEFORE

After having been raped once, Hamilton said she was fairly nervous. She locked all the doors and windows at night and preferred to have someone with her.

After Hamilton thought she heard somebody in her house in Manhattan, she asked her sister if she or her boyfriend had come home, but they had not, and her other roommate was out of town. Hamilton told her family what had happened, but they thought she must have been dreaming.

THE NIGHT OF THE ATTACK

For the next two weeks, Hamilton said she was nervous. One night, Hamilton and her boyfriend went to a late movie. She said before they left her house they checked that all of the windows and doors were locked and looked in all of the rooms.

When they got back from the movie at about midnight, she noticed her washing machine was dripping, and the door was a little loose. She said she felt like something was wrong. She asked her boyfriend to stay with her, but he reassured her everything would be fine and told her to call the police if she felt like something was really wrong.

After he left, she hid her phone under a pillow and went to sleep. She woke up with someone sitting on her legs so she could not move.

"I have a gun," [he said] and he put it to my head, and that is basically what happened," Hamilton said. "And there was, like, all of these times that I could have called the police, but I didn't."

THE AFTER EFFECTS

Hamilton was raped that night by the Manhattan serial rapist. After he left, she said she was so distraught she did not think to call 911 right away. She said she called about five other people and her boyfriend was the one who eventually called the police.

It took Hamilton a long time to get past her experience, and though it was very personal, talking to a therapist, the police and the people at the K-State Women's Center was still helpful.

"When something like that happens, it shakes you to the core," she said. "You can't take your mind off it. You just spend time with people you love and doing things that you love to do and it kind of takes your mind off of it."

She said she spent a lot of time writing, painting and especially exercising, which she said her family encouraged.

"My mom, the first thing in the morning would push me out the door and say 'go run, go exercise!'"

BEING PROACTIVE

As she recovered, Hamilton began work to spread awareness for victims of rape.

"The best way to get people to report a rape is by hearing someone else's story," she said.

This is one of the reasons

she contacted the Collegian for this story.

"I'm not gonna stay in hiding especially if I know it can help other people," she said. "... I'm just remaining a victim as long as I kind of stay hidden ... by taking a stance and by saying, 'this is what happened to me' and saying, 'this is not right, you are no longer being a victim.'"

Society gives support for future teachers

Names such as "Jumping Jessica" and "Kind Kelly" could be heard from Bluemont Hall 225 as Kappa Delta Pi members gathered for an icebreaker activity Tuesday night.

Kappa Delta Pi, an international honor society in education, met last night at its monthly meeting to discuss officer reports and community involvement.

"Kappa Delta Pi is a great resource for educators and a great support system," Cassie Morrow, Kappa Delta Pi secretary said. "It provides a lot of information student teachers and new teachers might not know."

Morrow said she has been involved in the honor for more than a year and enjoys what Kappa Delta Pi has to offer.

Members are initiated into the society based on grade point averages, community service and K-State credits — students must have completed more than 50 hours. This year, more than 39 members were initiated into the society. After being initiated, members accumulate points to receive honor cords, said Kappa Delta Pi president Stacia Kaylor. The honor cords are then worn during commencement ceremonies.

"The points system is there so that members will stay involved," Kaylor said. "We think everything we are doing is really beneficial and it's also for honor cords."

To receive an honor card, she said members must have 60 percent of their required points for two semesters.

Kappa Delta Pi meets once a month, but because of a cancellation in January, its first meeting was Tuesday. Kaylor said she usually invites a speaker to come talk to the group about issues in the classroom.

"We had a principal come one time, and he told us what to wear to a job interview and what questions we would be asked," she said. "All the speakers really benefit the group."

Catherine Maderazo, co-adviser for Kappa Delta Pi, said the society helps students gain connections in the teaching world. She also said she is proud of the officers for rebuilding the organization and making it more visible on campus.

"We are the only honor society in the college of education, and we want to take an active role on campus," Maderazo, assistant professor in elementary education, said.

Indoor cycling provides workout during winter months

After Kansas' unpredictable weather patterns unleashed another batch of freezing temperatures, the last thing you probably want to do is layer on Under Armour just to get blown away outside. Maybe you were motivated in the morning when it was 50 degrees, but the temperature has probably dropped 30 degrees and snow is beginning to fall.

There's no need to let the weather dictate how intense you work out. No matter what your cardio routine is, try indoor cycling this winter and spring. Riding a bike or running on the road in bad weather or at night can be dangerous, but indoor cycling is completely safe. You don't have to worry about traffic, and you don't have to wear a helmet.

Indoor cycling is a group-fitness class on stationary bikes. The instructor is there to encourage you and push you a little farther than you might push yourself, but not too far.

Indoor cycling is good for people of all fitness levels. There is no impact when you ride a bike, and you always have the option of keeping a low resistance level or slowing down.

Runners, you may be lifting your noses up at the idea of riding a bike, but how many times can you run around the indoor track before you get bored and dizzy? Give your shins and your minds a break and get on a bike. You can kick your butt by riding harder or you can use the class as a recovery workout for tired muscles.

For those who are afraid of weight-lifting, there is also an indoor cycling class you can try. The Spinn' Strength class offered at the Peters Recreation Complex allows you to integrate strength training with a cardio workout. The strength training exercises are basic, and you still get a good cardiovascular workout.

However, if you'd rather just ride the bike for an hour, then Spintacular Ride is the class for you.

Whether you are trying to lose weight, improve your endurance or are just plain bored, indoor cycling has something to offer everyone. You don't have to wear padded spandex shorts, and you don't need fancy shoes. Just grab a water bottle and come try a class. Though some people think indoor cycling is intimidating (a room full of middle-aged women all wearing spandex, peddling madly and getting nowhere), but that's really just a stereotype. It isn't that bad.

Indoor cycling is fee-based at the rec, but you'll get your money's worth. Make sure you call ahead and reserve your bike because some classes fill up fast. The only way to know what it's really like is to come try it out.

Spring break with Sampson

I was sitting at home last Saturday watching some college basketball while planning my spring break, when my phone started ringing.

Now, this ring tone caught me a little off-guard because I had not heard it in a while.

Carrie Underwood's, "Before He Cheats," — yes, I have that one — started to blare, so I grabbed my phone and checked it out. It made sense after I saw the name that popped up. The call was from my old buddy Kelvin Sampson, and my first thought was that it was good to see him finally making legal phone calls again.

"Kelly, I'm on an extended vacation with pay," he said. "How about we take a little NCAA Tournament spring break trip?"

With a $750,000 buyout check in his pocket, I could see where he was going with this one. Being the recently fired head coach from Indiana would get us tons of attention on our travels, and the amount of great basketball we could watch from the conference tournaments in March would be worth it.

Needless to say, I accepted the gracious offer from Sampson, and my original planning for my spring break travels changed drastically. After much deliberation, Sampson and I decided to go with the following spring break basketball itinerary.

First up on the docket is the Big 12 Conference tournament in Kansas City, Mo. Because of Sampson's ties to the Oklahoma Sooners and my strong allegiance to the Wildcats, this was a no-brainer for our first stop. The basketball at this tournament should be stellar because of the parity toward the middle and bottom of the standings and extreme competitiveness at the top. Also, with tickets being hard to find and expensive, it will be nice for Kelvin to pick up the bill with some of that sweet buyout money.

The next stop Sampson and I agreed on was Omaha for the first two rounds of the NCAA tournament. The games in this region will most likely contain Kansas, Wisconsin and possibly Drake. Kansas, always a fun team to root against, should bring a large crowd and create an amazing tournament environment. Wisconsin, the front runners in the Big 10 Conference, will do the same. Drake, if placed in Omaha, Neb.,

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Women look to break losing streak

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After suffering through its second two-game losing streak of the season, K-State will get its chance tonight to find its winning ways again when the Wildcats play host to Nebraska at 7 p.m. at Bramlage Coliseum.

The last time the Wildcats entered a game with a losing streak was Nov. 22, when they played Michigan State following losses to Wyoming and Tulane. K-State lost to the Spartans before stopping the losing streak with a win over Lipscomb on Nov. 30.

The Wildcats have lost their last two games, 68-65 to Oklahoma and 73-68 to Colorado, but K-State coach Deb Patterson said the challenge has been losing players to foul trouble. This was evident against Colorado, when junior forward Marlies Gipson fouled out of the game after playing just 17 minutes and finishing with six points.

"When you get a player like Gipson who has to be off the floor the majority of the game, it's going to be very difficult for us," Patterson said. "It puts a great deal of pressure on our basketball team because she is a big-time player who makes big-time plays, and down the stretch of the game you want and need that on the floor."

In Gipson's absence, junior guard Shalee Lehning scored 19 points to lead the team in scoring. K-State has struggled in recent games when either Gipson or senior guard Kimberly Dietz, the team's leading scorers, have scored less than 10 points. While Lehning said she believes neither player has had a bad game this season, she called Gipson's struggles at Colorado just a part of the game.

"At Colorado, Marlies was a victim of circumstance," Lehning said. "Obviously, she was on the bench in foul trouble and there wasn't a lot she could do about it."

Sophomore forward Ashley Sweat has also stepped up for the Wildcats during the losing streak, scoring 15 points against Colorado and 25 against Oklahoma. Sweat said the Wildcats just needed to improve their team defense against Colorado and improve their team play with substitutions on the floor.

"I think we play as a unit," Sweat said. "Whether it is a post or a guard, I think when a sub comes in, we just need to come together more. I think the issue wasn't so much getting into foul trouble, but we needed to play better team defense."

The Wildcats will play their final home game of the season Saturday when they host Missouri at 2 p.m. and will finish the regular season March 5 at Kansas.

Students display numerous forms of anxiety habits

By Brandon McAtee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In anxious moments, people tend to respond to pressure differently. Many turn to nervous habits, whether they notice it or not. They bite their nails, bounce their legs and pull or twist their hair, among other habits.

For instance, Laura Koger, junior in theater, said she pops her knuckles in anxious moments.

"When I try to stop, I usually just try and sit on my hands," Koger said.

Many people suffer from nervous nail biting, and it can be triggered for various reasons. Erika Blue, psychology intern for Counseling Services, said there are several reasons for people's nervous responses.

"I think the reason is in the name — people get anxious and degrees of anxiety are going to differ from person to person," Blue said. "That nervous habit might be how people deal with anxiety, depending on the situation, rather it be for a test or a date."

Blue said habits usually form when individuals receive some sort of benefit from their behaviors.

"If a person feels comforted or relieved by performing a certain behavior like nail biting, then he or she is more likely to perform that behavior to relieve feelings of anxiety or nervousness in the future," she said.

Habits form in different situations, mostly from situations causing anxious feelings, but Blue said people often confuse feelings of anxiety.

Typically, anxiety and boredom are considered two different experiences, Blue said. So, while people might demonstrate certain behaviors when they are bored, like fidgeting, nervous habits are usually thought to be caused by anxiety.

"The important thing to remember is that the term 'anxiety' covers a range of feelings," Blue said. "Thus, some people experience a transient, everyday form of anxiety such as nervousness before a test or before giving a presentation in class, while others may have symptoms that are quite serious and negatively influence their quality of life."

These nervous habits can cause physical consequences, which eventually could lead to harm.

Theresa Doyle, health educator at Lafene Health Center, said there are several cases of this type of harm.

"People who bite their nails run the risk of chewing up the sides and cause open wounds around their nails, which could lead to bacteria getting in and possibly causing infection," Doyle said.

However, Blue said there are healthy habits that can replace nervous habits in moments of anxiety, like exercising or writing about their feelings.

"Any type of movement like walking, or talking with a friend, is likely to help deal with anxiety," Blue said.

If the habit continues long after the feeling of anxiety is gone, or if a person has everyday anxiety, Blue said she suggests to seek counseling to get their anxiety under control.

KING'S KITCHEN

'Godfather' offers several Italian recipe possibilities

Next to cooking, movies are my second passion in life. I love everything about them; their ability to tap into human emotions and express them on-screen is amazing. No matter how one is feeling, there is always a movie that can provide answers to problems in life.

In the film, "You've Got Mail," Tom Hanks tells Meg Ryan that all the answers to life's problems can be found in the movie "The Godfather." He might not have been exactly correct, but the genre of gangster movies does provide secrets in cooking.

After Don Vito is shot in "The Godfather," Clemenza explains to Michael, played by Al Pacino, the importance of learning how to cook for a large group. Clemenza then prepares his tomato sauce with meatballs.

I don't have a drop of Italian blood in my body, but I love Italian food — the sauces, spices, meats and pastas all coming together to make an amazing flavorful experience. Most pastas taste similar unless homemade, so the sauce is what sets the flavor apart.

There are many different combinations to this meat sauce; one can use hamburger, Italian sausage or meatballs to complement the meal.

BRETT KING

ITALIAN MEAT SAUCE

2 tablespoons of olive oil, divided
1 pound ground beef
1 white onion, diced fine
2 garlic cloves, minced fine
2 cans Italian Style stewed tomatoes, undrained
1 (6 ounce) can tomato paste
1 can tomato sauce
3 ounces cremini mushrooms, thinly sliced
½ cup water

Directions:

Add 2 tablespoons of oil to ground beef in a large skillet over medium heat. Once meat is browned, run it through a strainer to remove excess grease and set aside.

Add the other tablespoon of oil to a large sauce pan or soup stock pot, and sauté onions and garlic for two minutes or until transparent. Put meat in with onions and garlic, then add stewed tomatoes, tomato paste, tomato sauce, cremini mushrooms, water and Chianti.

½ cup Chianti
2 teaspoons dried basil
2 teaspoon dried oregano
2 teaspoon dried thyme
1/2 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon pepper
1/8 teaspoon cinnamon
Dash of sugar
Red Pepper flakes (optional)

When adding the dried herbs (basil, oregano, thyme) crush them in your fist before adding to the sauce. Add the salt, pepper, cinnamon, and sugar. Personally, I love a spicy red sauce so feel free to add red pepper flakes.

Bring sauce to a boil, then keep at a simmer. Allow the sauce to simmer uncovered for at least 30 minutes to an hour. The sauce will be ready when desired thickness is achieved. Sauce can be frozen for use at a later date.

WILLIAMS: Coach Eustachy completes break experience

would be a great team to watch because they are the Cinderella story this year in college basketball. Omaha will be a blast.

The final stop on our spring break journey will be the Houston Regional of the NCAA tournament. Getting down south will be fun for Sampson and me because Houston is near the ocean, and most importantly, South Padre Island. Besides watching great college basketball, we are planning on meeting up with resident party animal and former Iowa State coach Larry Eustachy and hitting the true spring break scene hard.

With the itinerary set, travel plans made and tickets on the way, getting excited for this tournament season is going to be no problem. I've got a good feeling we are going to be watching the Wildcats for a while in March, and the best part might be getting to share it one-on-one with coach Sampson.

Kelly Williams is a senior in secondary education. Please send your comments to sports@pub.ksu.edu.

delightful and most of all, the performers were great."

Hopper said the competition gets tougher and tougher each year, and this year was definitely the best year.

"It was really difficult during auditions this year to narrow down to our top 10," Hopper said. "K-State Idol '09 should look out."

Hampton said he is also pleased with Tuesday night's outcome, though he said he was anticipating more audience turnout.

"It went really well," Hampton said. "I was incredibly impressed, and the judges were very tight with the scores. It worked out really well and I enjoyed it."

He also said students should have come tonight because it was a free, fun and a quality show.

Several audience members said they enjoyed the performance and were glad they chose to attend the bandstand.

"I came because one of my friends was a contestant," said Jake Schmidt, sophomore in architectural engineering. "I liked it a lot and am really glad I came. I thought all the performers were great, and I liked the interaction the judges had with the singers."

Pirate candidates Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr, senior in electrical engineering, and his running mate, Scott "First Mate" Carlson, junior in electrical engineering, celebrate their progression in the election at Gumbly's on Wednesday night.

Pirates remain after surprising result

By Rebecca Perez

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr and Scott "First Mate" Carlson's watch party was se-date until the primary elections results were announced. When Schurr, who was listening on headphones to the KSDB 91.9 FM broadcast of the election results, heard that he won, he jumped up and exclaimed "yeah," then ran over to hug his running mate.

Carlson, junior in electrical engineering, said at first he was in absolute disbelief that they had won, then there was the rush of exhilaration because they were still able to "take out the ninjas."

Schurr, senior in electrical engineering, was still in shock three hours after the announcement. He said his first thoughts were, "well that's it, it's decided."

Schurr also said there was suspense and worry, which quickly turned into disbelief and excitement.

"There was a lot more excitement than disbelief," Schurr said.

Schurr's wife, Diane, and son, Aaron, were there to support him and his running mate.

Members of the pirate campaign were waiting at Gumbly's for the announcement with Schurr and Carlson, including their press secretary, Chad "second mate" Miller, sophomore in electrical engineering, and Ben "the scallywag" Schreiber, junior in mechanical engineering, along with three members of the press and Schurr's family.

Bryan Cox and Piper Hoskins soon stopped by to congratulate Schurr and Carlson.

Andrew Glazier and Dane Miller congratulated the pair, followed shortly by Lydia Peele, senior in mathematics education, and her running mate Robert Swift, junior in political science.

Several Peele and Swift supporters stopped by as well.

Glazier, senior in social sciences, and Miller, junior in political science, decided to back Peele.

Carlson said he expects Cox and Hoskins will support Peele, but if they want to throw their support toward the pirate campaign, they would be happy for the help.

Peele, Swift win primary decisively

By Adrienne DeWeese

Lydia Peele and Robert Swift stood face to face with their arms crossed and separated from their supporters at Tubby's Sports Bar Wednesday. They waited for the hour-hand to strike 6.

Shortly after the Student Governing Association online polls closed, the announcement was made: Peele and Swift won the primary election with 1,413 votes. But Mary Fox, senior in political science, interrupted claps and cheers with another announcement.

"Oh my gosh — the pirates," Fox said to Peele.

Tyrone "Redbeard" Schurr and Scott "First Mate" Carlson, who ran a platform based on pirate issues, finished second in the primary election with 516 votes.

"I had no idea what to expect for tonight, so it was definitely a surprise," said Peele, senior in mathematics education.

"It is what it is. I think they got a lot of people interested in the election."

Gayle Spencer, primary Student Governing Association adviser, gave Peele a hug after the results' announcement and said, "Argh, Matey."

More than 2,600 students cast their votes in Tuesday and Wednesday's primary elections, though more than 3,300 voted in the 2007 primaries.

Peele and Swift supporters in attendance Wednesday night included Chi Omega and Delta Upsilon members, Peele's and Swift's respective greek organizations. Michael Burns and Grant Groene, who served as K-State student body president and vice president in 2005-06, also showed their support.

Peele was elected as student body vice president on March 7, 2007. It has been more than 10 years since a K-State student body vice president ran for president. In spring 1997, then-vice president Aaron Otto ran for president and lost.

Student Senate members passed a bill on Jan. 21, 1993, that amended the SGA constitution to include a student body vice president. However, K-State also had a student body vice presidents during the 1950s.

Prior to Wednesday, Peele and Swift spent $2,462.51, with their highest expenses as T-shirts production, campaign signs and one banner. In comparison, student body president Matt Wagner and Peele spent $2,527.31 in 2007 prior to primary elections.

The pair will accept campaign contributions until

Emergency notifications tested

By Monica Castro

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All three of the campus-wide emergency notification systems were tested Wednesday morning, including the new text messaging system.

Steven Galitzer, K-State director of public safety, said he expected a few glitches in the text-messaging system, which was introduced Jan. 18.

Galitzer said the Department of Public Safety will work for the next few days to find why several text messages did not go through, he said.

"The texting [problems] we don't have control over, and we have to make people aware of that," Galitzer said. "I still encourage all who can get texting to sign up for it."

There are 5,700 students, faculty and staff enrolled in the text-messaging service.

"We think it worked as expected," Galitzer said. "We know that if we have 5,700 messages sending at one time, it clogs the system."

Wayne Stoskopf, junior in agricultural business, said the text-messaging service and other systems are a step in the right direction for more safety on campus. However, he said he received his message on his phone at 10:15 a.m., 15 minutes after the text was initially sent. He said he also had a friend who did not receive a text until 11 a.m.

"It is better than nothing, and it's something to keep looking into," Stoskopf said. "I think any way to communicate whatever problem there is, like weather or emergency, is needed."

He said having different methods of communication are beneficial to making the campus safer instead of relying on one avenue of communication.

The new text-messaging system will send everyone enrolled in the service an e-mail with a survey to see if students received the message along with other questions, Galitzer said.

The carillon system and K-State's reverse 911 system were the other two systems that were tested Wednesday.

Galitzer said the technicians testing the carillon systems, which are located in the Anderson Hall tower and used as a public address system, had to set the volume and adjust the tones. During the test of the carillon speaker, people were stationed in different areas around campus to test its range.

Wednesday's test was the first for the carillon systems, he said. They had to set volume and adjust other areas of the system to set tones.

"North of Waters Hall could not hear the carillon speaker and around the south edge of campus, but the carillon speaker is for folks outside in the center core of campus," Galitzer said.

The final emergency system to be tested was K-State's reverse 911 system. This system is operated through K-State's police department and calls departments around campus leaving a message stating the emergency or if school has been canceled.

Among the 900 calls made through the reverse 911 system, 750 went through, Galitzer said.

Though there were problems with every system tested, he said, they do what they can to fix each of those problems and conduct tests to make sure they are working properly.

Galitzer said the Department of Public Safety is open to all people who want to leave ideas or suggestions concerning safety and the systems on campus.

"I think [the security system] worked how we wanted it to work," Galitzer said. "We wanted to test how well it worked and find what the problems were and what to get fixed. We are far ahead than other universities because we aren't just talking about this stuff, we are doing it."

Manhattan man survives shot to head

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 22-year-old Manhattan man was shot in the head at about 1:45 a.m. on Feb. 10 at his residence, according to a police report.

Samuel Ortiz was found with a single gunshot wound in the back of the head after Riley County police responded to a 911 call from Ortiz's address, 2500 Farm Bureau Road, Lot 70, according to the report.

Ortiz initially was transported by Riley County Emergency Medical Services to Mercy Regional Health Center. From there, he was taken by an ambulance to Stomont-Vail Health Center in Topeka, according to the report. He has since been released.

Riley County police arrested Joshua R. Hedden of Manhattan on Monday and charged him with aggravated battery for "recklessly causing bodily harm to Ortiz with a deadly weapon," according to the police report.

Hedden also was charged with felony obstructing legal process and criminal possession of a firearm. According to the report, his bond was set at $10,000, and he remained confined at the time the police report was released.

The initial investigation led police to believe the incident was accidental. Follow-up investigation revealed the subjects involved in the incident had given police false information, according to the report.

Police will continue to investigate the incident. Additional charges are possible, according to the police report.

WEIRD NEWS

PYTHON STALKS, EATS AUSTRALIAN FAMILY DOG

BRISBANE, Australia — A 16-foot python stalked a family dog for days before swallowing the pet whole in front of horrified children in the Australian tropics, animal experts said Wednesday.

The boy and girl, ages 5 and 7, watched as the scrub python devoured their silky terrier-Chihuahua crossbreed Monday at their home near Kuranda in Queensland state.

Stuart Douglas, owner of the Australian Venom Zoo in Kuranda, said scrub pythons typically eat wild animals such as wallabies, a smaller relative of the kangaroo, but sometimes turn to pets in urban areas.

"It actively stalked the dog for a number of days," Douglas said.

"The family that owned the dog had actually seen it in the dog's bed, which was a sign it was out to get it," he added.

"They should have called me then, but (the snake) got away, and three or four days later, I was called and went around and removed it" after the dog had been killed, Douglas said.

By the time Douglas arrived, all that could be seen of the dog was its hind legs and tail.

POLICE CHASE MAN ON LAWN MOWER

VANCOUVER, Wash. — A man led police on a very slow-speed chase, refusing to stop while riding a lawn mower at about 3 mph across a busy street and steering it toward an officer before he was grabbed and arrested, a police report says.

Now, authorities say, the question is whether Stephen Ray Castor, 53, already under investigation in the breaking of a window of a man's house and the episode with the officer, can also be charged with drunken driving. State law is silent on whether riding mowers are covered by the law against driving under the influence.

Castor remained in the Clark County Jail with bail set at $40,000 pending a court appearance Friday.

Police said the chase began late Monday afternoon after Jason Taylor reported that Castor — a stranger to him — cursed at him, rode the mower through his fence gate and smashed a window with a lawn chair.

MAN TRIES TO ROB A BANK TWICE

PLAISTOW, N.H. — Police said the same man tried to rob the same bank, wearing the same clothes and telling employees the same thing on Tuesday as he did two weeks ago. The outcome was not the same.

Two weeks ago, the robber got away with cash from the Sovereign Bank branch. On his second attempt, tellers refused to give him money and he took off empty-handed.

Police and bank employees said it was the same guy. The robber said he had a gun and demanded money both times.

Witnesses told police the man got away in a black Chevrolet Avalanche with New Hampshire license plates that contained the numbers 223.

$1 BIRTHDAY BET MAKES MAN A MILLIONAIRE

LONDON — A British man celebrated his 60th birthday in unexpected style this week-end when a 50 pence ($1) bet on the horses turned him into an instant millionaire.

Fred Craggs, from Yorkshire in northern England, was not even aware of his win when he walked into a branch of the William Hill betting agency to see how he had done with his accumulator bet.

When he was informed of his good fortune, he was said to have turned rather pale and muttered that he had better go home to tell his wife.

His coup was selecting eight winners running at various courses around the country — starting with one called "Isn't That Lucky" and finishing with "A Dream Come True" — at odds of 2,000,000 to one.

SGA PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

Cox, Piper lose primary to pirates by less than 3 percentage points

Bryan Cox, senior in political science, and Piper Hoskins, junior in economics, show their disappointment during their watch party at Kite's Bar and Grill after the results of the primary election Wednesday night.

By Willow Williamson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 5 p.m., about five to 10 people sat around the tall bar tables at Kite's Bar and Grill in Aggieville. Most of them wore brown T-shirts with "Bryan Piper Think Change," in white and green letters written on them. By 6 p.m. at least 25-30 people were talking excitedly of the upcoming preliminary results for their candidates for student body president, Bryan Cox, and vice president, Piper Hoskins.

At 6:05, the results were in, and KSDB-FM 91.9 announced the winners of the preliminary Student Governing Association election as candidates Lydia Peele, senior in mathematics with running mate Robert Swift, junior in political science; and candidates Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr, senior in electrical engineering and "First-Mate" Scott Carlson, junior in electrical engineering. Cox, junior in political science, and Hoskins, junior in economics and political science, were running on a three-tiered platform of "Functional, Freedom and Forward."

The team focused its campaign on talking about the changes they were hoping to make in the system.

"The way to talk about the campaign, is to talk about the issues," Cox said.

Recently, the team received complaints from candidates Peele and Andrew Glazier, senior in hotel and restaurant management, that more money than was allowed had been donated to Cox and Piper because of discounts on T-shirts the pair bought.

"It was a desperate measure pulled by desperate candidates," Cox said.

He said the complaint was repealed by Peele and Glazier at about 12:05 a.m.

"They did it just to get a headline in the newspaper and the radio station," he said.

Though both Cox and Piper seemed upset at losing in the preliminaries, they both said they will continue to stay involved in student senate.

Piper said she hopes to get into the judicial side of SGA, because she said she eventually wants to go to law school. She does not intend to run again because she plans on graduating before the next election.

Cox said he will be busy with his senate campaign. For the next election, he said there is a chance he will run again.

"We'll see who's running," he said. "We'll see what the story is next year."

He said the most important thing he gained from his campaign was experience.

He quoted Thomas Edison; "I haven't failed," he said. "I've just found a few ways that don't work."

Glazier, Miller throw support to Peele campaign after taking last

Dane Miller, junior in political science, holds a poster from Lydia Peele's campaign while Andy Glazier, senior in hotel and restaurant management, gives their concession speech at Porter's Bar Wednesday night.

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andy Glazier and Dane Miller finished in fourth place with just seven percent of the vote, but Glazier said they won no matter the outcome of the election because of the people they met during the campaign.

Before the results were released, Glazier, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said during his watch party at Porter's Bar that he didn't expect to win, but he thought he was into second-place contention with Bryan Cox, junior in political science, but far behind Student Body Vice President Lydia Peele.

He did not take into account the pirate duo of Tyrone "Red Beard" Schurr and "First Mate" Scott Carlson, who got second with 20 percent of the vote. He said he and his running partner built a strong relationship with the pirate pair.

"We got to know the pirates really well, and they're good guys," said Miller, junior in political science.

Though Glazier and Miller said they respected the pirates, they were supporting Peele, senior in math education, and Robert Swift, junior in political science.

"I feel Lydia and Robert will go on and address issues that we have brought forth, and we look forward to her being the next student body president," Glazier said after the results were announced.

Glazier said he emphasized making friendships with Peele and Schurr early in the campaign.

"There's no reason to make enemies," he said. "It's just easier to make friends."

Though he was friends with the two winning pairs, Glazier said he had issues with the way Bryan Cox, junior in political science, and Piper Hoskins, junior in economics, ran their campaign. Glazier filed a formal complaint last Friday, along with Peele, questioning Cox's expense report. Glazier and Peele said Cox might have failed to report a discount on some of his campaign T-shirts. The complaint was dismissed, and they appealed but soon dropped the complaint.

"Just because I dropped the complaint doesn't mean I don't think there's something fishy going on there," Glazier said. "There's a lot of unanswered questions."

Glazier spent less than $200 on his campaign, while Peele and Cox spent more than $1,000; all that money came from his own expense account to fund a Web site and several campaign posters.

"We have done just as well getting our name out there for less the $200 than others have done with several times more," Glazier said.

The Campus Fourum is the Collegian's anonymous call-in system. The Fourum is edited to eliminate vulgar, racist, obscene and libelous comments. The comments are not the opinion of the Collegian nor are they endorsed by the editorial staff.

Hey, Fourum: Um, yeah. We should be Facebook friends.

Michael Beasley can slam shut a revolving door.

Some dude about smoked a kid. Probably because he wasn't using the crosswalk. I think it was a Ford.

To the guy who didn't attend English: We're telling on you.

Beasley cannot have my kids.

Hey, people driving on campus: You need to stop for people in the crosswalks. This is getting ridiculous.

Get a bigger mailbox, Fourum. I have things to say to you.

If you hook up with a person you bought at a charity date auction, is that prostitution?

Hey, Fourum: The only thing I've learned this semester in physics is that my lab teacher is physically attractive.

Dude, I will ride my bike through the snow. I'm a champion.

I think Cardwell has more unibrows per capita than any other building on campus.

Hey, presidential candidates: Grow up.

Accidentally hitting someone in the crosswalk? That's called involuntary manslaughter.

Jacob Pullen: Next time you want to stare at my friend, just turn around and look at her for a while instead of trying to walk at the same time. This will probably help you not to run into so many walls.

Hey, everybody go to YouTube and watch a video called "Robert's Dash." You'll be very glad you did.

Today my Special K was 50 percent strawberries. It was a flavor explosion.

It's 50 degrees outside. The snow has melted. You can put those dead polar bears you call Uggs back in the closet.

The Fourum needs a bigger inbox. That's what he said.

You know it's a pathetic day in Kansas State basketball when you let the opposing team's white center score a 3-pointer.

Roses are red, violets are blue. I have herpes, so now you do too.

I got engaged to the best guy ever. Love you, baby.

FYI, liars go to hell. But I guess you already know that, right?

You want this? It's all yours. Come and get it.

Now is the time for the Fourum bandit.

Um, yeah. I would like to order two McChickens, a medium French fry and a water. Thanks.

Illegitimate state

Kosovo not justified as separate country from Serbia, will cause problems for U.S.

The pinnacle of U.S. foreign policy has been to support the development of new democratic states across the globe. Through funding and military action, we have worked to develop relations with countries who might become supportive of us.

BRETT KING

According to Reuters on Feb. 19, President Bush formally recognized the region of Serbia known as Kosovo as an independent nation.

"History will prove this to be a correct move, to bring peace to the Balkans," Bush said. "The United States supports this move because we believe it will bring peace. And now it's up to all of us to work together to help the Kosovars realize that peace."

The European Union also supported the independence of the Serbian region; however, Russia and Spain refused to recognize its independence.

Since this announcement by the United States, violence has broken out in Belgrade, the capital of Serbia. USA Today reported on Feb. 22 that the United States' State Department ordered all nonessential diplomats to leave Serbia immediately after the U.S. Embassy was attacked.

Though aggression against the United States is unacceptable, Serbians should be frustrated with the stance the United States has taken. Since the late 1990s, Serbia has been seen as the aggressor against a weaker power. However, the Kosovo Liberation Army has been the guilty party, slaughtering Serbs under the noses of U.N. Security Forces.

The Global Policy Forum, which monitors the policies of the United Nations, stated on their Web site, "The KLA attacked police and government installations as well as Serb civilians."

During his time in office, President Clinton ordered bombing attacks against Serbia on the basis of genocide. A Wall Street Journal investigative piece, written by the late Daniel Pearl in December 1999, demonstrated how the number of Albanians killed were greatly inflated and some of the bodies found showed no evidence of mutilation.

Unfortunately, Clinton's evidence of genocide was just as substantial as Bush's weapons of mass destruction argument in Iraq.

The Serbian region of Kosovo has neither the means nor the right to become an independent nation.

According to Gregory R. Copley, president of the International Institute for Strategic Studies and editor of Defense and Foreign Affairs, Kosovo fails to meet the qualifications of a state on many foundations.

Kosovo cannot sustain itself economically through legitimate means; the KLA is heavily involved in narcotics and weapons trafficking for financial support.

Foreign aid is the only other means of support for the region of Kosovo.

According to the New York Times on Feb. 19, "A donors conference will be held soon in Europe, and the United States will give $335 million in aid to Kosovo this year."

In his position paper, "The Burden of Statehood: Is Kosovo Ready?," Copley said, "For Kosovo to be recognized as a legitimate sovereign state, the international community must violate the sovereignty of another recognized state — the Republic of Serbia — by passing a variety of treaties, such as the U.N. Charter and the Helsinki Accords."

The region of Kosovo already has proven to be a failed state even before being recognized by countries around the world. The United States has set a dangerous precedent itself with its foreign policy. This decision will come back to bite the United States and Europe in the future.

Study shows youths change affiliation, not core belief structures as they age

According to a recent Associated Press article, the American religious landscape is rapidly changing.

A survey, conducted by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, stated that nearly one in four Americans change their religious affiliation between childhood and adulthood. When the study factors in changes from one Protestant religion to another, that number jumps to 44 percent.

This volatility is occurring at the same time that it seems specific religious affiliation is playing an increasing role in the politics of our nation. It is true our political history contains frequent references to a god or creator, both in our Constitution and in the language of our political leaders. However, the media age has added increased scrutiny on the personal religious lives of political candidates.

Moral issues have become a mainstay in our political polarization. And religious blocks like evangelicals are one of the primary constituent groups for the Republican Party and have flexed their collective muscle in recent elections.

Our presidential election reflects the sensitivity to a politicians' religious affiliations. Presidential candidate Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., long has dealt with rumors that he adheres to the Muslim faith, which he does not practice, including a dispute over pictures of him dressed in traditional African dress on a trip to Kenya in 2006 were leaked to the media.

Former presidential candidate Mitt Romney, had to give several speeches specifically concerning his positions on faith in the United States. As a Mormon, Romney often was asked to explain his personal faith and its role in his governance.

The winner of the Kansas Republican primary was none other than ordained Baptist minister Mike Huckabee, who has drawn fire for both his personal stances and the dogma of his denomination.

I could fill pages about the religious overtones in debates about abortion and evolution.

But what's interesting about the Pew Forum study is 25 percent of respondents age 18-29 said they are not affiliated with any religion in particular; however, the levels of those who claim to be atheists and agnostics remain low — 1.6 percent and 2.4 percent, respectively.

I fit into the unaffiliated category in the study; I've left the church I grew up in without taking up a permanent contrary position. And the new Al Green album and a bottle of wine forced me to ask the question, "Why?" I personally don't attend the church I grew up in because it doesn't exist anymore.

My childhood experiences were shaped by my parents' search for a place — a faith based on the constant search for what "God" was doing in a particular place and time. It culminated in them presiding over a church of a few hundred members, exactly split in thirds between the traditional white community of my hometown — often farmers and small business owners; the black community, there because of packing plant jobs; and Hispanics, who had moved to southwest Kansas to do migrant agricultural work and were moving into meat-packing jobs vacated by the black community.

It was a ministry that was grounded firmly in a particular place and time. By the time I became an adult, the needs and particularly the people that served as the core for that ministry had changed, subsequently taking church itself with them. But the searching and the desire for cultural diversity and harmony that typified the church of my childhood are ever-present issues.

Perhaps had respondents been asked not about the particular denomination they grew up in but about the core belief system that formed their religious experience, the results would have been different. What this study could suggest is that those who leave traditional denominations like Catholicism — which lost the greatest numbers of parishioners from childhood to adulthood — are not rejecting their faith but only the context of worship.

Paper to change rape coverage

To address the concerns of our readers, the Collegian is changing its policy on rape cases. Presently, our reporters take information directly from the police report. If the police do not report any injuries, then we don't either. The statement "no injuries reported" implies there was no abuse or trauma to the body other than forced intercourse. The statement of no injuries reported might be unimaginable to some because so many injuries are associated with rape.

Now, our policy will be to accompany "no injuries reported" with "according to the police report." The term alleged is included with the report for a number of reasons. The crime did occur, but no one has been charged. Also, we cannot assume the reports are always true, so "alleged" correctly describes the crime.

The Collegian understands the severity of rape. Rape is emotionally damaging experience, and students should know the negative effects of rape. The Collegian would never want to hinder the recovery of a rape victim by being insensitive. But reporters are taking straight facts from these police reports. Never has the Collegian joked about this serious crime, and the Collegian shows its support of rape victims by changing its policy.

Student involved with recruitment, along with several other groups

By Joe Vossen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Donnie Hampton never has been satisfied with watching events unfold around him.

Hampton, sophomore in business, said his record of service and leadership began before coming to K-State, when he was "that guy that did way too much in high school."

His freshman year he discovered the All-University Open House committee, a group of students who plan and implement the logistics for the annual event April 19. Hampton signed on but never imagined he would be given much responsibility his first year. To his surprise, he was chosen to coordinate an entire day of entertainment at Bosco Plaza during Open House.

This year will be Hampton's third year organizing the event — he is one of 16 students on the committee.

"Being in charge of Bosco Plaza's entertainment for K-State's Open House was quite an experience," Hampton said. "Being a freshman in charge of such an event definitely was a crazy experience. In a nutshell, being able to book acts, organize volunteers and get people where they needed to be — without having a budget — was pretty insane."

Though his undertaking was difficult, Hampton said he impressed student leaders and administrators and serves in the same position this year. "It has been great," Hampton said. "I gained an opportunity to work behind the scenes for K-State."

Hampton said the experience has been worthwhile, and he has been introduced to new people and new friends.

"Being involved in high school, it was only natural for me to want to be involved in college," he said. "On top of that, I knew being involved would allow me to meet other people that had the same aspirations as me. That is awesome, because I love to meet people."

Hampton still finds time to invest in other organizations. He is a member of Circle K International, Student Alumni Board, Union Program Council, University Grievance Board and the Diversity Programming Committee.

"On top of all of this, I am heavily involved with my fraternity, Delta Sigma Phi, and the Kansas State University Honors Program," he said.

With so many commitments on his calendar, it is hard to understand where Hampton finds the time to work on campus at New Student Services, giving tours to prospective students.

But Hampton says his job is one of the most rewarding parts of his day.

"Being a tour guide on campus is a great stress reliever," he said. "When I am working, I'm actually having a lot of fun, so I don't mind work. It's honestly a break for me. If you see me while I'm giving a tour, say 'hi' because I love that."

Hampton's success stems from his humility and desire to stay out of the spotlight. Though he has desire to be involved and leave the situation better than he found them, he is still modest.

"I love being able to take on a project and build some-

K-State needs KU win to stay alive

About this time a month ago, I would have never imagined the K-State basketball team would be in this position.

The game on Saturday at KU could make or break the Wildcats' season.

MIKE DEVADER

After starting Big 12 Conference play 5-0, including a home win over then-No. 2 KU, the Wildcats have won three out of their last eight and only one of their last four games.

After the victory against Kansas, the Wildcats seemed to be a legitimate lock to make the field in the NCAA Tournament, but since then, K-State has fallen off a bit, and the term "bubble team" might sneak into its vocabulary.

Even with the Wildcats' losing streak, they once again can solidify a spot in the tournament with a much-needed road win in Lawrence.

There are two factors K-State fans should worry about when watching the game Saturday night. First, the Wildcats haven't been very successful on the road in conference play, winning only two games: the opener against Oklahoma and later at Colorado.

Second, what will KU's mentality be in this game since they will be looking to avenge their first blemish of the year?

Let's hope the game isn't comparable to this year's series between the Wildcats and the Missouri Tigers.

Missouri was the first game after the thrilling upset of Kansas, and K-State had to travel to Columbia, Mo., and play in an arena that is a pretty tough place to play for any road team.

The momentum from the victory over KU was over, and the Wildcats couldn't hold on to first place all by themselves for more than one game. K-State was upset 77-74.

The much-anticipated rematch between the two Big 12 North rivals ensued on Feb. 16 with the Wildcats dominating the entire way. There was some concern on how K-State would play in this game since they had come off another disappointing road loss to Texas Tech, but the Wildcats quickly put all those questions to rest by winning by 37 points.

With the combination of K-State's poor road play and Kansas' home-court advantage, this game could be a laugh if the Wildcats aren't careful.

I don't see this happening unless K-State completely comes in unprepared and unwilling to play hard. Plus, it's KU, and if the players can't get pumped up for this game, then there is definitely something wrong.

Another reason to hope the Wildcats have a chance to sweep the Jayhawks is Bill Walker.

Walker is coming off the worst game of his career at any level of play. Since he is the vocal leader of this team, he will make it a point to perform much better in Allen Fieldhouse.

Hopefully, though, the whole team plays much better than they have the past couple games, because if only two players show up to play KU, K-State could get run out of the gym.

Look for another thrilling Big 12 game on Saturday, but for the first time in three games, the Wildcats play team ball and once again beat KU.

Senior guard Blake Young pretends to choke freshman guard Jacob Pullen. Of all the characters on the team, Pullen identifies freshman forward Jamar Samuels and junior forward Andre Gilbert as the funniest players.

Pullen weighs in on Will Ferrell, video gaming skills

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State freshman guard Jacob Pullen has been a part of the Wildcats success this season, averaging 10.3 points per game. Pullen recently sat down to discuss less serious issues like movies, Will Ferrell, video games and funny teammates.

Obviously there are a lot of characters on this team, but who would you say is the funniest?
Jamar Samuels and Andre Gilbert. They compete every day for it. Jamar and Andre do things in practice to make you laugh and before the game. They're just characters. Everybody sees me and Mike [Beasley] because we are in the public eye, but they are really the funniest guys on the team.

What's your favorite movie?
"He Got Game" just because it was a good basketball movie for me, and it's kind of how life was for certain people being in college. My college visit wasn't like that, but just where people are trying to give you stuff and the NCAA rules, you just have to be careful with certain people.

That's different than people would think because people see you and Beasley with all the "Talladega Nights" quotes. What can you say about that movie?
That's one of my favorite movies too. Will Ferrell is a funny dude, and me and Mike watched that movie like 100 times this summer when we were in summer school. It's just a really funny movie.

Did you get to see Will Ferrell when he was here for the Funny or Die Comedy Tour?
We almost had a chance to meet him, but he was running late for the show, and we had to get out of [Bramlage] — we had just got out of practice.

How good of a basketball player would you think Ferrell is?

He's probably horrible, but it's probably funny to see him be that horrible. If he came to basketball practice, we would probably embarrass him.

Who do you think would guard him? Maybe Beasley?

No, we would probably just put Chris Merriewether on him because he is our defensive stopper.

What kinds of activities do you like to do after practice?

I sleep a lot. If you ask anyone on the team, I am the sleepest dude. I could sleep 24 hours. Other than that we play video games.

Which video games are you playing?

I beat Ron [Anderson] in FIFA a lot. I beat him 10-4 last time, nothing special though. It was almost a close game. We play College Hoops 2K8, and I blow them out a lot in that. I play with K-State and Memphis, and usually I beat them by like 20 because, you know, those two teams are the best two in the country. NBA 2K8, I usually blow them out with the Boston Celtics. It usually won't even be a game.

Is there any game you're not the best at?

Bill Walker is actually the best at NBA 2K8 on XBOX 360. He usually blows people out a lot. Playstation 3 is my game, but on XBOX 360 he dominates.

Who have you learned the most from on this team?

I've probably learned a lot from the fat boys. They call us fat boys because we eat a lot so we stick together. We like to get meals. Look at Bill [Walker], he looks like he's hungry now so we will probably grab something to eat after practice.

Wildcats edge Cornhuskers, end 2-game losing streak

By Joel Jellison
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No matter what K-State did Wednesday, Nebraska kept challenging for the lead.

Even when the Wildcats took an eight-point lead with 2:09 left to play, K-State had to battle to pull off a 69-65 win at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State (19-8, 11-3 Big 12 Conference) opened the second half with a 37-30 lead, but the Cornhuskers (18-10, 7-7 Big 12) whittled away at the lead and pulled within one at 42-41 with a 11-3 run.

The Wildcats went ahead 49-44 with 11:38 left to play following a quick 7-3 run. K-State extended its lead to 65-57 with 2:09 when sophomore guard Karl Kincaid hit a three-pointer.

Nebraska immediately stormed back with an 8-0 run to tie the game at 65-65 with 45 seconds left. K-State coach Deb Patterson said her team had some breakdowns down the stretch to allow the Huskers back in the game.

"I think we were really good until the last few minutes, and I think we had a few breakdowns, but they also stepped up and made some plays," Patterson said. "We made enough plays to keep us in the game, and we felt good until the last four minutes."

With 22 seconds left in the game, junior guard Shalee Lehning came off a screen from junior forward Marlies Gipson to score a go-ahead lay-up for the Wildcats. Lehning said she initially was looking for any opening she could find.

"Marlies did a great job of setting a screen, and I was just trying to keep the ball alive and hope something would open up, either a drive lane or one of the wings for a shot," Lehning said. "In my head the mentality was, coach has said all day to me that when I came off I needed to look to score, and I just happened to make it."

Nebraska tried to set up a game-tying play, but Gipson disrupted a drive by Huskers junior forward Kelsey Griffin, and K-State senior guard Kimberly Dietz stole the ball. Dietz sunk two free throws on the other end to secure the win. Gipson said she was ready to stop the play from the Huskers because Nebraska tried the same play in the same situation in the previous matchup on Jan. 30 when K-State won 77-75.

"Up at Nebraska, they did that same play to try and tie the game, and [Griffin] had scored on the possession before, and I was just taking a chance to go and help and Dietz had a great drop and got the steal," Gipson said.

Griffin led the Huskers effort with a team-high 17 points and eight rebounds. The junior said her team played better defense in this

K-State baseball team begins long road trip in Texas

By Joe Bergkamp
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team will be in action again this weekend when the Wildcats travel to Beaumont, Texas, for the Cardinal Classic. The Wildcats will be looking to right the ship early in the 2008 season after dropping a pair of games last weekend to California and Santa Clara.

K-State will match up with Arkansas State (3-1) at 1 p.m. Thursday. The Wildcats get Big Ten foe Michigan State (1-2) Friday for the first of two games in the Classic. The second game between the Wildcats and Spartans is scheduled for 11 a.m. Sunday. K-State will face tournament host Lamar (1-2) at 1 p.m. Saturday.

The win column might still be empty for the Wildcats, but the power hasn't been lacking. Last season it took seven games before anyone on the K-State team hit a home run, but so far this year both Jordan Cruz and Nate Tenbrink have both hit homers. However, for the Wildcats to get on track, they'll have to improve on their team batting average, which is a weak 191.

Starting Thursday, the K-State baseball team will play six games in seven days, all in the state of Texas. After the Cardinal Classic, the Wildcats will travel to San Antonio for a two-game set with UT-San Antonio beginning on Tuesday.

K-State makes its home debut March 7 against LeMoyné, the start of a seven-game homestead.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

'Vegan' article misses some points

Editor,

Thank you for your article "Vegetarians, vegans explore healthy options." While you point out several health benefits, there are other reasons to consider a non-animal diet.

One is the suffering of the more than 10 billion land animals killed annually for food. There is simply no way to end the life in a "humane" way, of a sentient being that, like us, wants to continue to live. Another is the environmental damage caused by raising animals for food. A 2006 United Nations report stated the meat industry is "one of the top two or three most significant contributors to the most serious environmental problems," including climate change and air and water pollution. The report goes on to say nearly half the water and 80 percent of the agricultural land in the United States are used to raise animals for food, and about one-third of the raw materials used in America each year is consumed by the farm animal industry.

Rape victim brave to share story, move on after ordeal

Editor,

I would like to commend Darcy Hamilton for having the courage not only to share her story but also to move on with her life. I am impressed that she continues to maintain a positive attitude and outlook on life despite the negative and traumatic experiences she's faced in the past.

By coming forward publicly, Hamilton has proved she is unwilling to become just another nameless statistic. She is a person, with hopes and fears, just like the thousands of other brave women who have survived rape and lived to tell. My respect and admiration goes out to her.

Students watch, discuss Japanese animation, review misconceptions, meanings of comics

By Veronika Novoselova
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anime is gaining popularity across the country, and Kansas is no exception.

K-State's Anime and Manga Society offers friendship among students who share the same interests in the art of Japanese animation.

The group meets at 7 p.m. every Friday in the K-State Student Union Big 12 Room.

"Anime covers a wide area of entertainment," said Lindsey Bird, senior in art. "I have always been fascinated by illustrations and animations."

Bird is the society's librarian and is responsible for keeping and maintaining the society's archives.

"I like to see how a story comes alive by artists," Bird said. "Japanese tend to create many story-lines, so anime is not cartoons with a shallow plot. There is a lot of drama, mystery and action."

Molly Miller, junior in microbiology, said Japanese cartoons are distinct from those in the United States.

"In American cartoons just one episode is a separate story," Molly Miller, junior in microbiology, said. "In Japanese anime you need to follow the plot through the whole season."

Many club members said they were interested in Japanese language and learning how to draw characters from comics and cartoons.

"I think anime is a good introduction into Japanese culture in general," Miller said. "It gives a little glimpse at what it's like to live in Japan."

Anime is also known for a variety of genres: action, romance, humor, science fiction and horror. Categories and sub-categories include anime for children, for teenage girls and boys, as well as cartoons about robots, monsters, fighting teams and many more.

One of the K-State society aims is to promote broader interest in anime and manga. In the 1930s, the film-making industry was growing very quickly in the United States and in Europe; in Japan, the movie industry was undeveloped because of budget, location and casting restrictions. So animation became an alternative way of telling a story, creating new characters and settings.

At that time, many of Disney's techniques were adapted and simplified to reduce cost and make it easier to draw cartoons for semi-skilled animation artists. The term manga refers to comics published in Japan. Most anime series are based on manga stories that often have meaningful messages.

"Only very few people in Japan get into it to the extent that they collect anime character items or dress up like the characters," James Fukuda, manga fan and graduate student in veterinary medicine, said most Japanese adults do not follow the manga culture as much as many believe. "I wish that people from foreign countries can also understand that there's so much more in manga than the 'cool' drawings and characters, that it is something people of any age can appreciate."

Yuko Fukunaga, junior in modern languages, read a lot of comic manga books in middle and high school, but has since stopped reading as many.

"I still read manga once in a while, but not that as much as you guys think we do," Fukunaga said. "I always get impressed about how much American people know about anime."

Jessica Whittamore, senior in criminology and the club's treasurer, said students who love Japanese animation and culture should not be afraid to show up to the club's meetings.

"There is a big misconception that anime lovers are antisocial people," she said. "It is not truth - we are a very open group. I have found a lot of friends here."

K-STATE FACULTY

Safety employee serves K-State for 42 years

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Larry Zentz remembers a different K-State. It was a K-State whose dairy barn sat where Throckmorton Hall now exists and whose hospital was in Dykstra Hall. It was a K-State whose practice football field sat in the current location of Rathbone and Durland halls.

But as Zentz will tell you, the campus might be larger and farther north, but its citizenry isn't much different since he started working in 1966.

"Campus hasn't changed a lot as far as the people," Zentz said. "Most people are real nice to work with. I enjoy my work, and with the people I work with it makes it easier to stay longer."

Zentz is one of the longest-serving classified employees at K-State. Classified employees include those in office and clerical, technical and professional, and service and maintenance positions. Zentz first came to K-State after serving in the Marine Corps. His father worked at K-State, so Zentz started work with the Division of Facilities with the construction crew. Two years later, he would start a job working with fire extinguishers that would occupy him for the next 40 years.

Zentz is a fire prevention inspector. He tests and documents different fire safety equipment like fire extinguishers and emergency lights in campus buildings. A clutter of red fire extinguishers line the walls of his office waiting to be pressure tested.

The fire extinguishers that can be found throughout the campus buildings aren't the same from when Zentz began working with fire safety inspection in 1968. Then the campus used foam and soda acid extinguishers that were large brass cylinders. After K-State no longer used them, Zentz made the last two into lamp-shades that now sit on his desk.

One could learn much about Zentz looking at the rest of his desk. Several fire certifications line his shelves along with a picture with Gov. Kathleen Sebelius from a ceremony where Zentz was recognized for his more than 40 years of state employment.

Besides the subtle pinnings around his office space, a large display surrounding parts of the room illustrates his long-time hobby. Models of German, American and Japanese fronts from World War II are laid out across countertops; he has added careful paintings and details on the models since his early days at K-State.

Zentz said he started the display by coming to work 30 minutes early to work on the ongoing project and continuing the hobby on his lunch break. Some of the pieces in the collection of models have 500 to 600 pieces of assembly, he said.

"Now that's dedication," said Paul Wilson Jr., an environmental technician who shares the office with Zentz.

During his time at K-State, Zentz was part of the campus fire department that used to exist. He also was a part of the security in Bramlage Coliseum when Ronald Reagan gave a Landon Lecture.

"I can remember the police on the roof tops around here," Zentz said. "It was interesting meeting the secret service guys and to be a part of that action."

Zentz said he plans to continue working at K-State at least until he can say he has been here for 45 years.

"And as long as I don't mind getting up in the morning and going to work, I'll be here," he said.

Wilson Jr. said he considers his relationship with Zentz to be symbiotic because they offer knowledge to one another through their areas of specialty.

"If and when he decides to retire, it will be a great loss," he said. "It will be up to myself and others in the department to pick up the slack."

Group pushes students to be financially frugal

By Eric Davis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students visiting the K-State Student Union Courtyard Wednesday afternoon received free Taco Bell soft tacos, T-shirts and financial advice during a step show performance by Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity.

K-State Saves, a local version of the nationwide program America Saves, sponsored the giveaways to encourage students to save money. Utah State University and Virginia Tech are also involved in the trial-run of the program.

The K-State Personal Financial Planning Club, the K-State Federal Credit Union and Commerce Bank sponsored the first K-State Saves program. It is designed to help students get out of debt and save money for after graduation, said Dustin Furrey, junior in financial planning.

"We are trying to fight credit card companies," Furrey said. "College students usually come out of college loaded down with debt with no financial knowledge."

Furrey, who is also the club's treasurer, said the group wanted to help students find the motivation to save their own money and resist the temptation of signing up for credit cards.

Jessi Chadd, senior in personal financial planning, said she and the group were trying to get students in the habit of putting their money to good use.

"[Students] are signing up and making a commitment either to pay $10-40 towards debt or to save $10 a week," Chadd said. "We are encouraging them to graduate and not be in mounds and mounds of debt and have some money saved up."

The Personal Financial Planning Club used funds from its organization to buy a 42-inch flat-screen television to get students to stick around and listen to its message.

The drawing for the television will be Friday, and the winner must be present to claim the prize.

The K-State Federal Credit Union gave away a $250 scholarship, and Commerce Bank joined in by donating a $500 gift certificate to the Union Bookstore, Furrey said.

Every Tuesday for the rest of the semester, employees from the credit union will spread out across campus looking for a student who is wearing the T-shirt that was given out, said Megan Kilgore, business development coordinator for the credit union.

"If students are seen wearing their T-shirt on campus, the credit union will be on campus giving out $100 to encourage people to save," Kilgore said.

and findings from fantastical worlds of goblins and fairies. And of course, since Jared is ornery and curious, he finds a key that happens to open a chest that happens to hold the very field guide Arthur Spiderwick sealed off and hid.

This book is packed full of decades' worth of information and secrets about the world of these sprites.

To no one's surprise, Jared breaks the seal, despite a written warning, and opens the guide. From this point on, Jared and his family are ridden with goblins and must fight against them to protect the field guide and their home. With the help of "Thimble-tack," the unusual creature who lives in the walls of the house and had the collection in the dumbwaiter, the family learns how to utilize the salt, tomato sauce and oatmeal to fend off the evil goblins.

Though the movie is full of impressive special effects and a variety of mythical creatures, it seems like there's too much plot for a two-hour long film. Certain aspects of the movie seemed to be sped up too much. Perhaps if there was a sequel, more story could be told with more special effects and less of an overkill for the audience.

version of the game, but didn't have the same opportunity to tie the game in the final play as they did in the Jan. 30 contest.

"The first game was hard because we had a shot at the last second to try and go into overtime, but this game I felt we defended them a lot more," Griffin said. "It was different things that hurt us this game. Our communication was really bad, and that was what hurt us in the long run."

Dietz led the Wildcats scoring effort with a game-high 19 points while Lehn registered a double-double scoring 11 points and matching her career-high in assists with 12.

The Wildcats trailed until midway through the first half when Dietz scored to give K-State a one-point lead with 10:22 left in the half. K-State trailed by as much as three points in the remainder of the half before going on a 13-0 run to take a 35-25 advantage with 1:55 left in the game. It was the Wildcats largest lead of the game.

K-State returns to action Saturday when it completes the home portion of its schedule against Missouri (9-18, 2-12 Big 12) at 2 p.m. The game will be celebrated as senior day for Dietz, senior forward Shana Wheeler and senior guard Carolyn McCullough.

PEELE | Presidential debate on Monday

Friday, but Peele said campaign-booth candy most likely is the only additional expense.

Peele said the pair's campaign slogan, "More For You" is a separate concept from the slogan "KSYOU" she and student body president Matt Wagner used last year.

"We wanted this to be completely new because I feel that the president role is very different from the vice president role," she said. "We didn't want to have any sort of repetition from last year."

While the "More For You" three-prong platform features "more peace of mind, more for the future and more for students' money," Swift said the pair will take students' feedback this week about the platform's general issues.

A town-hall style debate between the two pairs will take place 7-8 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union, and will allow students to leave feedback and input.

"That's what we're looking for," said Swift, junior in political science. "We want to know what the students want more of."

PIRATES | Group touts accessibility

While the losing candidates are endorsing the Peele campaign, Schurr said his thoughts have gone toward the K-State student body. He said he was surprised by the amount of support.

"The fact that we were out-spent by 20 times and still won is amazing. It shows that the system works," Schurr said.

"We would like to do something that the bigger campaigns do. We would like to make T-shirts with the logo "vote pirate" on the front and a skull-and-crossbones on the back. We want something that can be worn for longer than our campaign," Schurr said.

Schurr also said his campaign isn't about accessibility, but approachability.

"People don't care if you are accessible, they care if you are approachable. The pirates bring humor and approachability," Schurr said. "It is easier to strike up a conversation with a pirate than a politician. The race is definitely different now."

"Spiderwick Chronicles"

★★★★☆

Review by Alex Peak

Dwarves, sprites, pixies, goblins and elves from the movie "The Spiderwick Chronicles" help ignite the imaginations of children and adults alike.

It's an adventure story the entire family can appreciate.

It begins with the introduction of a broken family — mom Helen Grace (Mary-Louise Parker), daughter Mallory (Sarah Bolger) and twin boys Jared and Simon (both played by Freddy Highmore) — leaves New York City for a fresh start and moves into the Spiderwick Estate, which Helen inherits from her elderly aunt. As is to be expected from any plot starting with a divorced-parents situation, one of the kids, Jared, is out of control and ridden with anger issues. He expresses this by punching holes in walls, hitting his mom's car with a stick and refusing to speak.

Once the family enters the house, the magic begins. Helen flips the breaker and brings light to all the salt lining the window sills, bottles of tomato sauce, colanders upon colanders of oatmeal and stacks of honey-filled honeybears. The family brushes off the bulk of items by reminiscing about their great aunt's crazy lifestyle.

A few arguments and a sloppy dinner later, the family members go their separate ways in the house. Jared, the violent angry twin, hears something running in the walls. He begins jabbing a broomstick through the wall and eventually unearths a small dumbwaiter that has been hidden by layers of sheet rock. The elevator harbors many household trinkets, including the mom's keys and daughter's fencing metals, which have obviously been stolen and stowed away.

Without a second thought, Jared hops into the elevator and pulls himself up to a secret room. Turns out, the secret room was actually where Arthur Spiderwick kept all his materials

For the girls

Students who don't like beer have numerous options at bars like mixed drinks, wine, shots

By Ashley Frey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For college students, beer is the cheap way to go when wanting to drink alcoholic beverages. However, some students, particularly women, often prefer other alternatives to beer: the "girly" drinks.

The girly drinks category can include anything remotely fruity and colorful, usually not containing "manly" liquor like whiskey. These alcoholic drinks can be found in a variety of ways — wine, mixed drinks and shots.

"We usually see more girls ordering mixed drinks as opposed to beer, but we do have some beer drinkers occasionally," said Mike Phillips, manager at Kite's Bar and Grill.

Phillips said the most popular combination he sees women ordering include either Malibu coconut rum or Captain Morgan rum with pineapple juice or even Coca-Cola.

The brand UV Vodka is growing in popularity among women, Phillips said. UV comes in different flavors like blue raspberry, pink lemonade and green apple.

Popular mixed drinks, include cosmopolitans, margaritas, piña colodas, mojitos, tequila sunrises and Long Island Iced Teas.

"I prefer mixed drinks and shots, because mixed drinks taste the best and shots are just fun to take," said Rachael Ray, senior in psychology.

Ray said she usually orders vodka and Sprite when going out to the bar, because they are cheap and easy to order.

"But my favorite drink is Three Olives Grey Vodka with Red Bull because its my favorite liquor with my favorite mixer," Ray said. "I just love it."

For those who do not enjoy beer regularly, another alternative are the "girly" beers or malt beverages. These can include Smirnoff Twisted and Mikes Hard Lemonade products and other items that are high in sugar and fruit flavors. Smirnoff Twisted comes in raspberry, cranberry, Mandarin orange and green apple flavors.

These drinks might take longer to feel the effects, but people can take a more direct route to feel the alcohol by taking shots. Some shots can be taken with straight alcohol and possibly a chaser, but mixed shots do exist, like lemon drops, red-headed sluts and oatmeal cookies.

These shots generally include a mixture of different types of alcohol, making it easier to take than straight alcohol. Phillips said more women order mixed shots than actual straight shots when they come into the bar.

"My favorite shot of all time is Sex on the Beach," said Mandy Malone, senior in animal sciences and industry. "Mostly because the fruity taste overrides the alcohol."

Finally, wine is another popular drink among women. Many say wine is an acquired taste, but over time, people can learn to prefer wine over beer.

"If I'm somewhere classy, I like to stick with wine," Malone said.

For the non-beer drinker, options are available. Flavored beers are another route for those who can tolerate beer but still want that "girly" and fruity aspect.

Drinks other than cheap beer might be harder to find at the typical college keg party, but can be found and consumed nonetheless.

"I usually stick with mixed drinks and shots when I go out to the bars," Malone said. "And some bars have specialties. When I end my night at So Long's singing 'Sweet Caroline,' you'll find an amazing pineapple beer in my hand."

ASK THE FIFTH YEAR

5th year: Women have undeniable ability to smell good

Why do girls smell so good?

Wow.

I have no idea, but I know exactly what you mean.

Women have this thing about them. It's the same idea as Pigpen from "Peanuts," but the complete opposite effect. They have this aura of sweet-smelling goodness around them at all times, which an explanation in words could never truly do justice.

Example: Last summer some friends of mine went to see the movie "Transformers," and I brought a beautiful young lady along with me. She left afterward, and as I returned to my companions, only one said anything. My friend Jay calmly said, "She smells really good."

"Hell, yes, she does," I excitedly replied.

And it's true; she did.

I don't know what it is, but women smell amazing. And it's not like we're all creeps and wandering around sniffing you. Rather, it's that it radiates from you.

You could go work out, run around for an hour, sit and sulk in your own sweat and your nappy hair — Yes, ladies, sometimes it gets that way when you work out, but don't worry; we don't mind — and you'll think to yourself, "Man, I smell like crap." Nope. Daisies.

It's just who you are. It's ingrained in you. Accept it. We all have, and we love it.

It's all part and parcel of being a woman I guess. I caught on to this awhile ago and have tried to utilize it.

When the gang up and decided to go to Auburn last autumn, I asked countless women to join. "Why?" they would ask. I told it to them simple and true, "to make the car smell nicer."

There needs to be some way to bottle up this aroma of all things good and mass market it. Then friends might stop by my apartment and instead of asking if I've eaten corn recently (never), it might go something like this:

"Wow — that's amazing. Who's over here?"

"Oh, no one," I might reply. "That's just the Febreze you're noticing."

"Really? Oh, pray tell me, what is that mesmerizing scent?"

"Girl!"

Billions sold overnight.

Then there are those girls who, in complete defiance of all things natural in this world, have the ability to roll out of bed in the morning two minutes before class starts and still make it on time because they don't need to waste time with any make-up or perfume. Their beauty and good-smellingness are so abundant that to put on any anything artificial would just be overwhelming. You amaze me.

So while I don't know how you women pull it off, I would like to thank you just the same. To all the women in all my classes — especially last semester's Econ 555 — to those of you who must put up with me at work, to my mother of course, and the girl I see at Starbucks all the time: Thank you. If it weren't for you and all your glory, I might have to smell just myself.

Even more reasons to settle down

Former military leader plans to visit K-State more often

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gen. Richard Myers' office on the second floor of the K-State Alumni Center is practically bare. There's a desk, some papers of recognition framed on the wall, a few pictures and a small laptop computer on the desk — no file cabinets, no memorabilia from his decades of military experience, no evidence of use. After all, the 1965 K-State graduate only visits K-State for two or three days at a time every few months, and he rarely has time to sit in his office.

That's how Myers lives his life. Even after retirement from the military, there's no time or reason to settle down.

"I've moved too many times in my life, and so I've kept this kind of sparse. I don't like the idea of coming by here and putting the stuff in the trunk of the car," he said referring to traditional office decorations.

Myers could change that mentality as he plans to visit K-State more often and invest more time in the military history program.

Myers, the chairman for the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the start of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, is a foundation professor of military history at K-State. He, by no means, is a traditional professor.

When he came to campus last Thursday and Friday, it was the first time he was at K-State this semester; he won't be back until April. When he comes to campus, Myers talks to classes ranging in topics from leadership to political decisions of going to war to media ethics.

"I'm pretty much at the disposal of the university," he said. "They can use me any way they want to use me for the days that I come back to campus."

Myers retired from his post as JCS chairman, the highest ranking military officer, on Sept. 30, 2005. Since then, Myers has maintained his busy schedule; he is on the boards of several nonprofit organizations and planning committees, like the Defense Policy Board, which studies long-range issues for the defense secretary. He is also working on a memoir and a report on the future of national security challenges, which take up much of his time.

"I can't imagine doing anything else," he said. "I can't imagine, for instance, playing golf a couple times a week. I like golf, but I couldn't imagine doing that."

Retirement did lessen one aspect of Myers' life — stress. As chairman, Myers was the principal adviser to the secretary of defense, National Security Council and the president. Myers said he was in charge of determining the military's role in combating violent extremist groups during and after the conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq, sorting through the influx of correct and false information reports from all over the world.

Myers said it was hard getting all the government factions working together and focused on following the same track as President Bush. He also said he often had to make sure the government kept the military's and defense department's suggestions in mind.

"For me, the most frustrating part, the longer I stayed in the office, was trying to get the rest of the government to take [the conflicts] as seriously ... as the Department of Defense and the military — very frustrating toward the end," he said.

Myers said the only part of the job he missed as chairman was relating to and representing the 2.4 million Americans who wear uniforms, including reserve troops.

"The only time I ever miss it today is when I'm around troops of some sort, and you start to think, 'Geez, I'm one of them,' but

Kansas minimum wage to remain at $2.65

By Elise Podhajsky

The bill presented earlier this month to raise the Kansas minimum wage from $2.65 to $7.25 never made it out of committee.

Sen. Roger Reitz, R-Manhattan, said the chairman in the state Senate Commerce Committee did not agree with the bill, and it therefore was never heard by the committee.

Kansas currently has the lowest state minimum wage in the nation. According to an article in the Topeka Capital-Journal, this was the 15th bill of its kind to fail since the $2.65 rate was set in 1988.

"It's just ludicrous," said Reitz. "It's not something we ought to be very proud of here in Kansas."

But Don Fayler, president of the Kansas Restaurant and Hospitality Association, did

Blu-ray beats HD in format battle

By Deborah Muhwezi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since 1997, the DVD format has conquered the home-video market that once was ruled by VHS. In the current era of the DVD phenomenon, Blu-ray and HD DVD have been continuous competitors in the battle for high-definition video formats. Now, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. has chosen to only sell Blu-ray DVDs in its stores.

Wal-Mart announced its decision to sell only Blu-ray DVDs and drop the selling of HD DVDs in its 4000 stores across the U.S. last week in response to consumer preferences.

"We've listened to our customers, who are showing a clear preference toward Blu-ray products and movies with their purchases," said head of home entertainment for Wal-Mart, Gary Severson.

According to CD-Writer.com, the basic principles and structure of the two formats are the same. The main difference lies in the amount of storage capacity.

CD-Writer.com said Blu-ray discs allow a capacity of 25Gb and an approximate amount of 50Gb on a dual layer disc. An HD DVD will hold about 20Gb and 45Gb on a dual layer disc. As a result, several movie studios made the decision to concentrate on Blu-ray DVDs as the

Park management professor to visit small African country of Mali

By Salena Strate
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the need for developing tourism arose in Mali, the Fulbright Program called upon K-State professor of park management and conservation Ted T. Cable. He will be traveling to Mali, Africa, in May as a Fulbright senior specialist.

"The trip will be physically demanding," Cable said. "It will be well over 100 degrees everyday. It's a difficult place to live and to work."

In Mali, Cable will teach tourism students at the University of Bamiko the definition of interpretation. He said interpretation is similar to a national park tour guide explaining the prairie during a nature hike. Also, Cable will be working with the Mali Forest Service to start working on elephant-based tourism.

"It's one of the poorest countries in the world, so one of the ways they are looking for sustainable economic development is through bringing in tourists," Cable said. "By providing this training I hope the tourism people in Mali will provide a better experience for tourists so they will want to come back."

He said he also tries to educate people about saving nature in Africa, which in turn benefits people in the long run.

"When I write about Africa or work in Africa I try to give people hope," Cable said. "I think that's what's lacking in Africa, and that's the biggest threat, a loss of hope."

Mali is a landlocked nation in western Africa. It is the seventh largest country on the continent, with 65 percent of its land area designated as desert or semidesert, according to the CIA World Factbook. Mali is among the poorest countries in the world with a highly unequal distribution of income, according to the CIA.

Cable became interested in educating Mali citizens because of his family ties. Cable's wife, Diane, was the first white woman born in Timbuktu, Mali. Diane's parents were French missionaries in Timbuktu.

Cable said he always tries to talk passionately about Africa in his classes. One of his catchphrases is, "Once you go to Africa you never really leave."
